My friend who gave me these glad tidings has been an eye-witness, and was full of joy at the mere recital of them. His name perhaps you know—Mr. Theo. Kitchin, a dear and valued brother in Christ, known for many years. Does it not seem as though history was repeating itself? As Paul said to the unbelieving and Christ-rejecting Jews, "Lo, we turn to the Gentiles!" so now in these fair colonies our Lord by the great mass of the people is rejected. Their chief end appears to be to get money, to live in pleasure, to go after dress show, gambling, horse-racing, theatres, cards, intemperance, immorality, and stolid indifference to the things of God.

Methinks I see the Lord Jesus again in tears, saying as He looks over these large cities, "How often I would have gathered you as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings, and ye would not." So we turn to the despised dwellers in the Queensland sugar plantations; they will hear and live.

It was in "the highways and hedges" where the latest messages of mercy were sent, ere the invitations to the great supper ceased to be given, and the banquet began.

The Gospel for the Maoris.

UNLIKE Europeans, the Maoris are entirely dependent upon those of another race for general information. Although raised, in a sense, to a level with their European fellows, there is this unbridged difference still existing—their entire or partial ignorance of a civilized language—thereby debarring them from anything like equal advantages in this respect. To meet the needs of the natives in the Maori districts of both islands, the New Zealand Native Tract Institution has been instrumental in translating and circulating the Gospel among them. The tracts are much sought after, and the demand is invariably greater than the supply.

The hon. secretary, Mr. Joseph G. Baker, Gisborne, Auckland, New Zealand, writes: "After fourteen years' experience we recognise more than ever the desirability of furthering this work, and again appeal earnestly to our fellow-Christians to assist us in disseminating plain Gospel truths amongst a people who are really thirsting for such, and, lacking which, are literally 'giving heed to seducing spirits and doctrines of devils.' In our selection of tracts for publication we strictly avoid anything that may be sectarian in its tendency, or that might provoke controversy, and give as faithful and literal a translation as possible."

Telugu Mission, Bangalore.

IN the neighbourhood of Bangalore a remarkable work is sustained among the Telugus by Rev. G. W. Gillings, who went to India from Australia some ten or twelve years ago. The Telugus have no missionary in their own language, and, as there are no European helpers, all that is accomplished is through native agency. In a recent communication to Rev. G. Soltau, Mr. Gillings writes: "Two special features of work by our native brethren have arisen since I last wrote. Their own sickness from fever having caused them to go into hospital, they learned they could visit the natives there, and have done so. They have had access to two military hospitals, in each of which they were well received. On the departure of troops to China, some hundreds of vernacular were distributed. Work among the lepers and beggars has continued uninterruptedly. The Telugu part I take myself, by interpretation; and the Tamil and Kanarese are taken by native helpers."

GOSPELS, IN THREE LANGUAGES,

The efforts among the women—a work in which Mrs. Gillings takes so active a part—have had real and definite results. A group of women in one of the villages visited were being told of the love of God in giving his Son, when one of them leaned forward and inquired "What is his name?" It was new and strange to her. "Have you never heard of Him before? Has no one been to tell you?" "No, never." While the men have many chances of hearing the Gospel, the opportunities of the women would be few, were it not for the visits to their homes of Mrs. Gillings and interpreter, and the numerous native helpers, whose fidelity and whole-hearted service are a powerful testimony among their race.

"We have been privileged" (continues Mr. Gillings) "to go on as usual with our visiting, for which we feel very grateful. We are now going over the sixth village this year. We find the people inside Bangalore not listening so well this year, now that has gone. Many of them say, 'We have heard this once, why should we hear it again?' There is one old woman of whom we are very hopeful. She is almost double, and cannot be far from the end of life's journey. The last time we went I took her a piece of material to make a jacket. She was pleased with it, and exclaimed, 'You brought me this because you love me. You come here because of my soul, but it is a long time since you came.' This was true. We explained how many we had visited since we last saw her. Oh, that God's light may shine into this poor, dark heart ere she is called away."

Many trophies of grace have been secured from these regions of darkness, and the simple story of the love of God is surely winning its way into the hearts of the natives. At markets, fairs, &c., vernacular tracts and Gospels are widely distributed, and by these means the influence and sphere of the mission is ever extending, for the functions are visited by natives from long distances, who carry to their homes these gifts.

Mr. Gillings' address is 18, Residency Road, Bangalore, South India.

The Countess Schimmelmann has often been mentioned in these columns. Her life since her conversion has been one of adventure and romance. Above all, it has been a life devoted to God, and lived in the service of the highest interests of her fellow-creatures, rich and poor. She preaches the Gospel in its integrity, and has won a multitude of souls. Her wonderful deliverance from drowning when she fell from her yacht, in America, will be fresh in the minds of many, if not all, of our readers. We regret to say that that vessel had to be left there, and is now in danger of being sold at a ruinous loss to pay for repairs, if £100 is not paid before Christmas. The Countess has given freely of her substance, not hesitating to sell her jewellery to relieve the poor. We trust that the yacht, which is worth considerably over £500, and contains much which she values beyond its money worth, will not be allowed to be thus sacrificed.

In Central Kurdistan.

THE London Committee of the Central Kurdistan Mission recently met at 7, Adam Street, W.C., in the office of the Bible Lands Missions' Aid Society, when reports received from Rev. Joshua Khamis were considered. It appears that his way, so far, had been successfully opened by the gracious hand of God. Four little schools had been started in the mountain villages of Kurdistan, and a small orphanage of fifteen children had been commenced with the knowledge and consent of the Vali of the district. The orphans are reported as progressing mentally and spiritually, so also are the humble village schools. The missionary's evangelistic labours in the same rugged regions are represented as having yielded some spiritual fruit. By some of the village chiefs he was warmly welcomed, and nearly everywhere the people were eager to hear the Gospel.

The Nestorian people are anxiously anticipating the return of the missionary's brother, who is to become the medical missionary to his own needy and poverty-stricken country-men. Mr. Ezra Khamis is now qualifying at Edinburgh; he expects to obtain his diploma next January, and hopes as soon as the season permits to join his brother in Kurdistan, and then unitedly to struggle for the enlightenment and salvation of their suffering people.

By the latest report it appears that at the request of the local Governor, the little orphanage has been removed to the place wherein he resides, thus securing the sanction of the government. The applications for admission are so numerous and pitiable, that Mr. Joshua Khamis is very anxious to increase his number to thirty orphans, now that the severities of winter are drawing in around them; he also wishes to bring the number of village schools up to twenty-five. Money is sorely needly for this promising work, £120 being required at once for what is already in hand, besides the outlay for contemplated enlargement.

During a recent evangelistic tour in the mountains, the missionary met with an accident, being thrown by his mule when crossing a stream.

Correspondence regarding the work may be addressed to Rev. W. A. Essery, hon. sec. of Bible Lands Missions' Aid Society.

Progress in Finland.

A FEW years ago we called attention to an Evangelical endeavour in Finland, in the interest of which Mrs. Frances Swensson Parker is again on a visit to England. The work itself is well established, and the time has come for its consolidation and the provision of institutions needful for general development.

The scheme includes the erection of mission premises, with an Evangelical training home, and printing and publishing offices, at Helsingfors, the capital of the country. Already English Christians of all denominations have helped, and the land is ready for the building. The treasurer is Mr. Joseph Good, of Hull, and in order that the utmost confidence may be placed upon the enterprise, it has been decided that no money shall go to Finland until four feet of the proposed structure has been erected. The land is ready, and a considerable amount in hand. As is well known, however, Finland has been much impoverished during recent years, and outside help is more than ever needed.

Mrs. Parker's credentials are in every way satisfactory, and she will be glad of opportunities to interest benevolent people in the work to which she has already devoted so much time and energy. While in England, she may be addressed, care of Miss Mason, House of Rest, 10, Finchley Road, St. John's Wood, N.W.

Hancox Home for Male Inebriates.—Although a sum of £300 is required before this institution is opened with the funds in a satisfactory condition the committee of the Church of England Temperance Society have appointed a superintendent who took charge of the Home on the 5th inst. The first patients were received on Thursday.

The Indian Famine.

MORE CHEERING REPORTS.

IN a letter recently received by Dr. Colin Valentine from Rev. J. F. Steele, Irish Presbyterian Mission, Ahmedabad, the latter says: "Fever is very prevalent, but cholera is disappearing. The crops are suffering for want of late rains, and there will be considerable distress among the poor for some time. Just now they are getting grass reeds to eat." Dr. Valentine adds: "My Agra committee has assisted many of the poor people to return to their native country, supplying them with railway fares, food, and clothing."

In a farewell letter, Rev. Dennis Osborne, who, as our readers are aware, has sailed for India, expresses his cordial appreciation of the kindness he received on every hand while in this country. In the course of his communication, Mr. Osborne says: "With cultivators scattered, cattle destroyed, farming implements burned up, the sowings have been partial, and the harvest cannot but be scant. Even this will not be available for some time. Meanwhile, the hungry must be fed, the naked clothed, and the many thousands of young children saved from horrors deadlier than death must be supported and trained."

Mrs. E. H. Lawson, American M.E. Mission, Aligarh, reports:—"We now have about 450 orphan boys, over 350 widows, with their fifty-three babies and about 300 orphan girls, or over 1,100 in all. About 400 of these are of the other famine, and they have been much help in caring for the over 700 new ones. Still more are coming, for though we hear of good rains in many places, still some months must elapse before the grain can be reaped, and the winter is advancing and people are

WITHOUT FOOD, CLOTHES, OR SHELTER.

The shoe-shop for the boys is doing good work. Shortly a hundred will be engaged. Various other trades are taught, such as carpentry, masonry, &c., but shoe-making promises the most profit. The girls have taken up weaving, and are making good progress. The women of the home are becoming strong and able to work. At present they cook, grind, sew, etc., but will soon begin weaving. The brighter ones will be trained as Bible-readers and teachers: others as compounders, nurses, matrons, &c.

In the course of an interesting communication, Mr. G. S. Eddy, of the Y.M.C.A., whose letter describing the earlier stages of the famine aroused much attention, says:—

"God has heard and answered prayer, and after long distress the rains have at last come; the barren fields are again green, and, with the prospect of a future crop, the horrors of the famine have begun to abate. The gaunt, hungry crowds about the door, the feeble wail of mothers and little children, the dead bodies by the wayside or piled up heaps to be burned, will soon seem like an awful dream from which one has awakened to the weary and careworn veteran missionaries who have tried to save the starving people.

"In the worst districts they write that half the population has perished. Yet this chastening will afterwards yield its fruit. Beside the purifying and strengthening of the native Church, three are already beginning to be apparent:

"1. Thousands who would have died have been saved alive to hear the preaching of the Gospel. 2. With multitudes lying hungry and helpless, the Good Samaritan object lesson of Christian love and sacrifice—while so many of their Hindu brethren and priests have passed by on the other side—has had an influence beyond all human ken. 3. Thousands of children, whose parents have died or deserted them, have been rescued from death (or often worse than death), to be saved in mission orphanages, brought to Christ, trained in Christian character as the future leaders of the Church in India.

"The money sent has been used largely in giving employment to the destitute who were able to work by erecting mission buildings, digging wells for the poor people, and in other relief work, thus doing a double good. An effort has thus been made to give the people work. In addition to this, food has been given to the aged, the sick, and the starving.

"The great problem with which the famine leaves us is, Who will continue to care for and hold these children for Christ? Children rescued from the famine of 1877 have become, in many cases, the leading Christian preachers and laymen in the Native Church of to-day. But the history of the same famine shows that many had to be turned adrift because of the reaction in the support of the work after the temporary crisis of the famine. But we believe that that mistake will not be repeated, and that the work, which has already been an object lesson to the world, will be completed."

New York Notes.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

YESTERDAY, about noon, a handsome seven-storey building that I had passed about three hours before (as I have done every Monday and Tuesday morning for months) was the scene of a terrific explosion, followed by a fire that destroyed some thirty business buildings, and made forty more so unsafe that they will probably have to be pulled down.

Just across the corner, diagonally from the wrecked building, was the room in which the West Side Business Men's Monday Prayer Meeting was being held. This meeting has taken place every business day since January 26, 1876.

On Sunday the inauguration of a week of special prayer throughout this country and Canada for China, the missionaries there, and the native Christians, was inaugurated by a special memorial service for martyred missionaries at the Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church, at which Dr. Arthur J. Brown, Secretary of the Board of Foreign Missions, spoke. He said, in part: "Because they refused to leave Pao-Ting-Fu when warned, because they had the welfare of Christ's new-found children higher than their own lives, because they would not undo by retreat the work of years, these brave missionaries died, sacrificed as were their brothers in the Roman days."

The speaker eulogized the Chinese Christians, and said he doubted if a hundred men of those before him would have met death so willingly for their religion as the Chinese converts had. He was confident that no Administration in this country, at least, would ever be a party to an agreement excluding missionaries from China. He complained of the number of American gamblers and liquor agents who have free access to China, saying that this influence must be counteracted.

Twenty Years in Berlin.

IN 1880 Julius Rohrbach enlisted the sympathy of a few Christian friends by laying before them the spiritual condition of the German capital. An opportunity of preaching the Gospel was offered in North Berlin, where a dense population provided abundant scope for services. In Moabit two large rooms were furnished for conducting Gospel meetings, which were immediately organized. Throughout the day the people were visited in their homes, and the personal dealing with individual souls resulted in the gathering together of an earnest and constantly-increasing band of converts, and the consolidation of a work which has developed with encouraging results. The work at Moabit being thoroughly grounded, steps were taken to erect a Gospel tent at Charlottenburg This was the first mission tent in Berlin, and many. who were attracted by the very

the Gospel under canvas listened attentively and profitably to the message of salvation. In 1890 a hall was erected here to accommodate 500, and for the last ten years this has been a well-known centre of far-reaching missionary activity. From Berlin to Charlottenberg, advance was made to Potsdam. Here in a quiet way rooms were opened for the preaching of the Gospel, and this year a new hall has been opened in another part of the town. From these centres the brethren visit the surrounding villages with tracts, and for carrying on open-air missions. Sunday schools have also been inaugurated, and with numerous agencies have been fruitful in fitting many for useful service in the Gospel. Visitors to Berlin and friends from other countries will be heartily welcomed by Julius Rohrbach, at 28, Krumme Strasse, Charlottenburg, Berlin.

Conference in Paris.

DEAR SIR,—Those who have been praying for Paris will rejoice to hear the Lord has given great blessing. A four-days' Conference for the Deepening of Spiritual Life had been arranged by the French Brethren in connection with the Mission Intérieure. The selected speakers were representative of various churches, and included some who had not been hitherto invited. The meetings were at 9 a.m., 3.30 (for young people), 4.30 and 8.30. In the morning meetings there was liberty for any to take part as led by the Holy Spirit, and, as a consequence, as God was not limited by man's preconceived ideas, his grace was most blessedly manifest. Some who had been workers in Paris for thirty years said they had never seen such a manifestation of God's grace—and many of us felt most definitely the Lord's Spirit in our midst, first showing the great shortcomings in our Christian life, and then revealing Him "full of grace and truth." Is not the comparatively small result of Christian conferences in England largely due to the fact that the leaders have made the arrangements according to their own preconceived ideas and experience, instead of seeing that they, like John, must "fall at his feet as dead," if they are to have a "revelation of Jesus Christ," and hear what his messages are for the various churches.—Yours for Christ's sake, Radstock.

The Needs of Kabylia.

SEVENTEEN years ago, the writer of these lines had his attention directed to the Kabyles of Algeria, through an article in The Christian, by Mr. Geo. Pearse. One of the results was ten years' labour in Kabylia.

Leaving the mission field somewhat reluctantly, in 1893, work at home in the preaching of the Gospel and in ministry of the Word to Christians, presented itself, along with the delightful service of enlisting sympathy on behalf of labourers abroad.

In a recent communication, my namesake, H. G. Lamb, says: "Do you ever meet with any who feel led to work in this direction? The field is vast; we are few. How is this people to know the Gospel?"

Our brother who writes thus, is stationed at Tazmalt, in the province of Constantine, along with a fellow labourer, J. Griffiths, and their wives. Notwithstanding petty persecution by the French authorities, our brethren are holding the fort and meeting with encouragement. Besides these labourers and our brother Allen Moore and his family, and Miss Gillard, and our Swiss brother Henry Mayor, there are a few other labourers in Algiers connected with the North Africa Mission. They are seeking to evangelize among these interesting people, all of whom are Mohammedans.

It may be that through this note the attention of some may be directed to the needs of Kabylia, and, if unable themselves to go forth, they may at least help to strengthen the hands of those who have gone forth. Our brethren at Tazmalt would greatly value the gift of a tent for camping out in among the villages.

Further Massacre of Missionaries.—Our readers will hear with regret that Mr. A. H. Baynes, general secretary of the Baptist Missionary Society, has received the following telegram, dated Chifu, November 8, from Rev. J. P. Bruce, one of the Society's Shang-tung missionaries:—"Shansi messenger returned confirms Tai-yuan-fu massacre, Pigotts included; reports Dixons, McCurrachs, Underwoods, Renaut, Ennals left Hsin-chau for cave in hills, June 29; Boxers found them armed July 21 and returned not; during attack official went with soldiers promised escort to the coast; missionaries, already five days without food, came out, taken to Hsin-chau, imprisoned till August 9, then killed inside city gate."

Business Men and Missions.—The Warehousemen and Drapers' Foreign Missionary Society was founded in 1898 in connection with the City of London Bible Class Union. Its objects are "to create and foster a spirit of missionary enterprise among business men of the City, and to support those who may go from our midst, both in their preliminary training and in the foreign mission field." The principle adopted is to support one who has been accepted by a missionary society, and claim him as "Our own missionary." One is labouring under the Congo Balolo Mission, while another is being trained for foreign service by the C.M.S. The hon. treasurer is Mr. R. D. Stewart, 61, Mansell Street, E.

Pandita Ramabai,

THE INDIAN CHRISTIAN PHILANTHROPIST.

To speak of Ramabai as a Christian Philanthropist, is simply to emphasize the most public side of a truly wonderful life. Mrs. Helen S. Dyer tells the all-round and connected story in her beautiful book just issued.* To say that the pages are sympathetic is a platitude; it is a pleasure to notice their warm devotion to the cause of India's women, and their striking portrayal of a career remarkably unique and greatly blessed of God. There are biographies which confine the thoughts of the reader within the narrow compass of a life spent upon mere trivialities. Here is one which from first to last compels the conviction of a Divine Providence, ordering the steps of a noble soul. Ramabai's earliest days, no less than her maturest labours, show the working of God, in directions auguring good for India's millions in the coming time.

Ramabai's father was a notable man, of the priestly Brahmin caste; one who "sought the Lord, if haply he might find Him." He was regarded as a holy and learned man; and, in pursuit of high ideals, he instructed his children, irrespective of sex, in the sacred learning of his people. As a child Ramabai acquired Sanskrit, so that it was at command as her mother tongue. She also learned Marathi, Kanarese, Hindustani, and Bengalee. Her parents having died, she went on a pilgrimage with a brother, an intelligent young man, who shared her resolve to test, wherever possible, the teaching of the sacred books of the Hindus. Already their faith in Hinduism had been shaken, and they became known as reformers, especially as advocates of the cause of female education. Meantime, at a solemn conclave of pandits, the learning of Ramabai was duly acknowledged; she received the title of Sarasvati, and was thus permitted to call herself Pandita.

Having, at length, rejected Hinduism, Ramabai married a Bengalee lawyer, an M.A. of Calcutta University, similarly enlightened. In less than two years, however, she was a widow, the cholera having snatched away the devoted husband. A little daughter, Manorama ("Heart's Joy") remained to cheer the widow's solitude. Resuming work as a lecturer, Ramabai sought to educate public opinion on questions of social and educational reform. The condition of woman, ignorant and degraded, and especially of the neglected child-widows, appealed strongly to her heart, and she endeavoured to show that the evils denounced were not of the essence of Hindu religious teaching and practice. In 1882 the British Government appointed a Commission to inquire into the question of education in India, and the evidence given by Ramabai introduced her to a circle wider than the Marathi Brahmins. She came to England, and was received into the home of a Church of England Sisterhood at Wantage, where she stayed for a year. She confessed herself a Christian, and was baptized on September 29, 1883. Receiving the appointment of Professor of Sanskrit in the Cheltenham Ladies' College, she extended her studies. After a year and a half she accepted an invitation to America, where she wrote an important book on "The High-Caste Hindu Woman," for the information of Western readers, and carefully examined the kindergarten system, in the hope of applying its principles and methods in educating the women of the land of her birth.

Ramabai's life-long desire to educate Hindu widows—that through them a door might be opened into the dense darkness of Hinduism—now took tangible shape. She travelled much in the United States, and circles of help were organized in many places. Hence the Ramabai Association, with headquarters in Boston. It was resolved to maintain a neutral platform on religious questions; pupils were to be free to retain their caste, and perform their Hindu religious observances. To Ramabai's great joy, Miss Soonderbai H. Powar, another cultivated Christian Hindu, associated herself with the work.

The centre of operations at this time was at the Sharada Sadan ("Abode of Wisdom") at Poona. Widows were received up to the capacity of the school, and quite early some of them became Christians. Simultaneously, Ramabai herself was experiencing spiritual enlargement. What had been nominal with her, became real; and, from Holy Scripture and Christian fellowship, many lessons for life and godliness, were acquired. At length the Home became known as a house of prayer, and the support which Brahmin friends had given while it was less openly Christian, was accordingly withdrawn.

The work grew beyond expectation, and a fruit farm was purchased at Khedgaon, forty miles south of Poona. Mrs. Dyer writes:—

As Ramabai's Christian life strengthened and deepened, she became more independent of even the opinions of her quondam Brahmin friends. At the same time, she kept strictly to her covenant of giving an entirely unsectarian education, with freedom to her pupils to observe all their Hindu customs. The Brahmin community gradually came to the conclusion to let Ramabai alone. They accepted the fact among themselves that she had gone irrevocably from them; and that all the benefits of her work, which they had looked upon to shed lustre on their ancient religion, were quite lost to them. A rival institution, or what was intended to be a rival institution, to the Sharada Sadan, was started as a boarding establishment in connection with the Poona Girls' High School; but, though it existed for a few years, it never flourished greatly. Some of the girls who had been removed from the Sadan were placed in this institution, but more than one finally returned to Ramabai.

As time went on, the light of Christianity shone more and more brightly on the Sharada Sadan. The Christian Endeavour meetings prospered. Morning and evening prayers were held in a large room, and attended by a majority of the pupils. Ramabai's little daughter, Manorama, whose heart had been early opened to Divine influences, took a leading share in carrying on the work among the girls. Those who were interested in Christianity, and not forbidden by their guardians, attended church and Sunday school outside, as well as the ministrations of a Poona missionary, who held meetings in the prayer room once a week.

The natural outcome of all this teaching was the creation, among those girls who had received Christ, of a desire for baptism. Several of the girls made their own arrangements with the missionary whose classes they attended, and were baptized in the Methodist Church at Poona. Ramabai let things take their course; and those who were thus disentitled as pupils of the Sharada Sadan had work found for them in various spheres. One or two became teachers in schools; some were employed as teachers in the primary department of the Sadan; and others, unfit for teaching, accepted posts as servants of the establishment, cheerfully undertaking menial work as unto the Lord.

Intellectual belief having advanced to simple trust, Ramabai was on the high way to still greater blessing; and in 1896, at a camp meeting in the Lanouli woods, near the summit of the Western Ghauts, eighty miles from Bombay, she became conscious of definite progress in spiritual experience. She shall tell the story herself:—

"My heart was full of joy and peace, and I offered thanks to the Heavenly Father for having given me fifteen children [that number having publicly confessed Christ]; and I was by the Spirit led to pray that the Lord would be so gracious as to square the number of my spiritual children, increasing them to two hundred and twenty-five before the next camp meeting takes place. Every circumstance was against the very thought. For, in the first place, no more than sixty or sixty-five girls at the most could be admitted in my school. Then the number of my school girls was but forty-nine, and some of them were to leave during the summer holidays. Things were going very much against my schools, and I did not know where to get even fifty girls for my institution."

It was a prayer of faith; and how the Lord would answer it was not in the calculation. It was answered, however, and most marvellously. In a few months a terrible famine had Central India in its grasp; and without money, but assured that God would supply her needs, Ramabai set out for the Central Provinces, to gather in the destitute and dying child-widows. When it was known that the devoted woman had embarked upon this mission, there was no lack of money to cover the cost of sending the poor girls and women to Poona, and of maintaining them when there. Agents of Satan were on the track of the defenceless children, luring them to sorrow and destruction; Ramabai was in advance of these, and, with a mother's love and Christian earnestness, induced many a hesitating girl to accept her kindly protection. The dirty and degraded were not passed by:

"Some are little better than brute beasts. The filthy habits they have acquired during this period of famine have become second nature with them. It will take a long time to civilize and teach them. We can do all things in the power of the Lord."

The outbreak of bubonic plague in the region of Poona hampered the work, but was not allowed to hinder it materially; it led to the extension of operations at Khedgaon. In all from five to six hundred women and children had been gathered in the year; such as were suitable for the Sharada Sadan were taken there, and the remainder passed on to various mission orphanages. Just 300 remained with Ramabai, the number which she set out to rescue, and whom she felt able to regard as her own God-given children. Free from the interference of ignorant and bigoted parents and guardians, she could instruct these in the way of life.

All the available spiritual help she could obtain was pressed into the service of teaching the Word of God to these as they returned to health and strength. Ramabai believed that God was going to answer her prayer, and give her that measure of spiritual blessing which she had, as it were, seen in vision at the Lanouli camp meeting. The Spirit of God worked with the means used. Ten months after she started out in faith to the famine districts, she was able to report that ninety of these girls had given themselves to God, and were showing signs of a real change of heart by serving and helping other girls, by their self-forgetfulness and love one toward another. As these girls professed salvation, they were taken to the river by Ramabai, and baptized by a missionary in the name of the Triune God.

The new settlement at Khedgaon was called "Mukti"—Salvation; and here, as if by Divine command, Miss Minnie F. Abrams, a deaconess of the Methodist Episcopal Church, commenced work during that eventful year, and a great awakening was experienced. It is a means of grace to read the chapter which describes the outcome. We extract sentences only from Miss Abrams' letters:—

"The revival prevailed, not only among those who had been rescued from famine, but reached to a goodly number of the widows who were previously in the Sharada Sadan. It was an outcome of special services held by Rev. W. W. Bruere—first for ten days in the Poona Home, when 116 women and child-widows were baptized. He then went to Khedgaon.

"The women had been prepared for these services by a constant daily religious teaching ever since they entered the Home. . . . The meetings were continued; and as the crowning event, November 15, the baptismal service took place. It was a rare sight when seventeen bullock carts, crowded with seven and eight women in each, started out for the Bheema River, five and a half miles distant from the farm. . A tent was pitched on the bank of the river, which served as a dressing-room. A short service was held by Mr. Bruere, after which the baptisms took place.

"One of the school-mistresses on the shore called out the names of those to be baptized. It was very interesting to hear each one repeat with the minister, 'In the Name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost' . . . 108 women and girls, and one boy of twelve years of age, were baptized.

"When Pandita was taking the names of those who were asking for baptism, a little girl of six years tugged away at my dress and said, 'Bai, bai, mere nam likna' (Bai bai, write my name). This dear little child, who prays much and gives evidence that she really loves Jesus, was carried into the water. Mr. Bruere took her into his arms and put her under the water. Jesus took such in his arms and blessed them."

At a camp meeting, held at Khedgaon in December, 1897, Ramabai praised the Lord for having given her the harvest of souls for which she prayed. The number which were laid upon her heart had, in fact, been exceeded, so the Settlement, with its capacious and substantial buildings, was joyously dedicated with the name "Mukti," in reference to Isaiah lx. 8, "Thou shalt call thy walls salvation."

In 1898 Ramabai visited America in the interest of her work, and afterwards she came to England. She returned home to increased responsibility, and to face new difficulties through continued famine. Mukti has developed marvellously as an industrial centre. There is a Rescue Home, and the teachers and matrons include helpers after Ramabai's own heart. On August 3, this year, as many as 1,550 young people had been received, and still they were coming. Hundreds of young women are now in course of training for lives of usefulness. It is hoped that many of them will be teachers and Bible-women, while those who become wives will introduce into the life of the country a vigour and intelligence favourable to the spread of Gospel light and liberty.

Ramabai is a woman with a distinct mission. Mrs. Dyer's handsome volume narrates a fascinating story in words of soberness, and without a trace of adulation. The portraits and other engravings are a deeply interesting embellishment. Oh, that the pages may point a lesson to some Western women as to ways of serving God, and the spirit in which to do so with greatest acceptance!

THE LATE

Rev. Thomas Evans,

OF BOURNEMOUTH.

DURING the last decade Wales has been called upon to part with one after another of her best and most gifted sons. Drs. Saunders, O. Thomas, and T. C. Edwards, amongst the Calvinistic Methodists; Drs. John Thomas, D. Roberts, and Herber Evans, amongst the Congregationalists; Revs. J. Thomas and R. Roberts, amongst the Baptists; and last, but not least, Rev. J. Evans ("Eglwysbach") amongst the Wesleyans.

And now to the long roll of illustrious dead must be added another familiar beloved name, that of Rev. Thomas Evans, of Bournemouth. Born at Newtown, Montgomeryshire, July 1, 1843, Mr. Evans was only fifty-seven years of age when he died. His parentage was humble, and his early advantages few. It was his own earnings that enabled him to secure a little educational training for himself. So well did he work that he became a schoolmaster, and it was while filling this post at Aberhosan that he began to preach, under the ministry of Rev. D. M. Jenkins, the well-known Congregationalist, of Liverpool.

A few years later Mr. Evans was received into the ministry of the Calvinistic Methodist Church, and in 1873 became pastor of the Welsh Church at Welshpool. In 1876 the young pastor exchanged his sphere of labour for a larger one in Merthyr, Glamorganshire. His connection with Hope Church at the latter place brought him into considerable prominence, and the name of "Evans, of Hope" became a familiar one in many parts of the Principality. He spent in Merthyr eight years of happy and fruitful service. Under his charge, Hope Church doubled its membership, and his ability as a preacher caused him to be in much demand for special services. As a temperance speaker, so forcible and powerful was his style that he was infrequently called a second Gough. To the end of his life, Mr. Evans was an uncompromising opponent of the drink traffic. In 1883 he was elected Grand Worthy Chief Templar of the (English) Grand Lodge of Wales.

In 1884 the Congregational Church at Lancaster Road, Preston, extended a unanimous invitation to Mr. Evans to become its pastor. This call he accepted, and remained in his new sphere for two years. His stay at Preston introduced him to a larger public, and secured for him a wider reputation. As preacher and lecturer his fame was in all the churches round about.

Removing to London in 1886, Mr. Evans succeeded Rev. Dr. McAuslane in the pastorate of the Victoria Park Congregational Church. Here again his personality and ministry became the objects of warm and deep appreciation. As a lecturer upon subjects of popular interest, Mr. Evans enjoyed a well-deserved fame. His lectures upon "Gladstone," "Garfield," "Billy Bray," "J. B. Gough," "Peter Mackenzie," and others, were delivered in all parts of the country.

After ten years' work in the Metropolis, Mr. Evans undertook the spiritual oversight of the church at East Cliff, Bournemouth. Before he had quite completed four years' service, the home-call came to him. On July 30, "devout men carried him to his burial, and made great lamentation for him," for to many of them he had been, not only a teacher through whom they had been instructed, but also a friend and a brother.

Points and Outlines.

THE HOUSEHOLD MISSIONARY.

(Luke viii. 39.)

"SHOW how great things God hath done unto thee." This is the true method of the household missionary. He has a story to tell of personal experience, of marvellous mercy, of grateful love—that he has been himself saved with a great salvation, and has a great Saviour to commend to others. This, in his mouth—and on due occasion all Christ's public servants will employ it as well—touches men's hearts, and spreads the glory of Jesus. "He departed, and began to publish in Decapolis how great things Jesus had done for him, and all men did marvel." The mission was successful, for the worker did exactly at first as the Lord bade him, and he was soon able to do more. Professor Laidlaw.

FOUR "WHOSOEVERS" OF SALVATION.

Whosoever believeth (John iii. 14-16).
" drinketh (John iv. 14).
" calleth (Rom. x. 13).
" will (Rev. xxii. 17).

FAITH AND UNBELIEF.

Faith is the root of all good; incredulity (unbelief) is a root of all evil.
Faith maketh God and man good friends; incredulity maketh them foes.
Faith bringeth God and man together; incredulity sundereth them.
All that faith doth pleaseth God; all that incredulity doth displeaseth God.

A PROSPEROUS SOUL.

(3 John 2.)

What are the marks of a prosperous soul which it behoves us to aspire after? First, A prosperous soul is one in whom the truth dwells, and dwells richly. The Apostle describes Gaius, in the first eight verses, as having the truth dwelling in him, as walking in the truth, as beloved for the truth's sake, and as being a fellow helper of the truth.

Secondly, A prosperous soul is one where the doctrinal and the practical parts of religion bear lovely proportion and are united. There is a kind of religious epicures—men, I mean, who are all clamorous for doctrinal truth, but have no regard to the practical part of godliness. On the other hand, there are some who, at the expense of truth, are constantly crying up morality and practical religion. These things ought not to be divided; doctrinal and practical religion should be united.

Thirdly, the prosperous soul is one in which is united a happy mixture of the retired and the active—attention to the duties of retirement mingled with an equal attention to the duties of active life.

Fourthly, the prosperous soul may be known by this, that it is accompanied by a good degree of public spirit and largeness of heart. A man that is concerned principally about himself can never have a prosperous soul. Christianity cultivates a public spirit, a largeness of heart—not that narrowness of mind by which we consecrate all that we have and are to ourselves.

Finally, the prosperous soul is dispossessed of an ambitious spirit—it is meek and lowly. "The Lord is nigh to them that are of a lowly spirit and a contrite heart." "He giveth grace to the humble, but the proud He knoweth afar off." Andrew Fuller.

Home Missions.

Homes for Working Girls.

THE trials and besetments of working girls in the metropolis are too often but vaguely understood, and the wonder is, not that so many go astray, but that so many are not to be found possessing noble and unblemished characters. It is gratifying to find that the various sections of the beneficent work carried on through the Homes for Working Girls in London many are in a healthy and prosperous condition.

During the year the institutions have been well filled, as many as 2,184 having passed through. Year by year the girls and young women who live in the Homes realize more fully that in following Christ there is nothing of gloom or selfishness. The newness of life which it creates fills them with renewed hope in their endeavours to help and support themselves, and smoothes the way of their difficulties and loneliness. Young women and girls, earning their own living, who can substantiate their character, are eligible for admission, and are thus brought under Christian influence and friendly guidance at a critical period of their lives. Many, with brave hearts, bearing their own discouragements, long for the sympathy of friends, under the pressure of want and the scorn of the world, and the

DESOLATION OF THEIR OWN HEARTS.

The unity and kindliness of manner apparent in the Homes is a gladdening proof of the fruitful work accomplished. Many attachments formed are deep and touching, and a spirit of unselfish affectionate regard is shown towards those who, through no fault of their own, are out of employment.

Everything in prudence and reason is done to elevate the home life within the institutions, and to bring happiness into the lives of all in their daily struggles. The benefits bestowed have been instrumental in influencing and strengthening the characters of thousands of girls and young women. Such ministry to the physical needs and spiritual interests of the masses of working girls must ever occupy a worthy position in Christian philanthropic organizations, especially in these days when young women are playing so important a part in the commercial life of our great metropolis. The founder and director of the Homes is Mr. John Shrimpton, 3, Victoria Street, Westminster, S.W.

Hebrew Christian Testimony.

AMONG the contents of the October number of The Scattered Nation (3d. Morgan & Scott), the quarterly organ of the Hebrew Christian Testimony to Israel, is an article from the pen of Rev. C. A. Schönberger, entitled "The Roumanian Exodus: Incidents at our Centre." The rapid and almost alarming emigration of masses of Jews from that country has been noticed in numerous Jewish papers, which have presented appalling pictures of distress and starvation prevailing among the Jews of Roumania. Mr. Schönberger's recent experiences at the Mission House, to which wandering and bewildered Jews are daily finding their way, will be read with sympathetic interest by all who are anxious for the conversion of Israel.

It is gratifying to find that the building of the new mission-house is progressing. Since the publication of the last number of the magazine £1,100 has been received in free-will offerings towards the outlay, bringing the total of the building fund to over £6,000. Some £2,000, it appears, is still required, in order that the new centre may be opened free from debt. In this number Rev. David Baron resumes the notes from his diary relating to the incidents of his tour in Palestine.

SEAMEN'S CHRISTIAN FRIEND SOCIETY.

ABUNDANT evidence of the usefulness of this Mission has been furnished at gatherings recently held at some of its coast stations and headquarters.

At Appledore, on the North Devon Coast, both the Sailors' Rest and the Seamen's Bethel are occupied by the Society, and during the year 199 services have been held. The reading and recreation rooms have been largely used by seamen and fishermen, over 1,000 informal meetings for conversation, Bible reading, and prayer have been held with ships' crews afloat and families on shore, 590 missionary visits have been made to ships, &c., and bags of books, Scriptures, and tracts supplied to numbers. Mr. W. D. Hanson, J.P., the local treasurer, spoke with thankfulness of the spiritual blessing which continued to attend the mission. Rev. A. Gurney Goldsmith, the vicar, said he was in fullest sympathy with the good work, and was sure that the missionary was working faithfully and well. Rev. G. J. Hill then presented the Royal Humane Society's vellum certificate to a young seaman who, at risk to his own life, had saved a boy from drowning.

A good account was given at the Town Hall, Fowey, of the work on the Cornish coast. In the past year 318 services had been held ashore and afloat, 763 short conversational and prayer meetings had also been held, 1,500 visits had been made to ships and homes, and relief had been given to sick and distressed seamen. Thousands of seamen had used the reading and recreation rooms. One hundred had boarded at the Sailors' Home, Fowey, and about one thousand beds had been let to seamen. Mr. John McCall, who presided, said he had seen a great deal of work among seamen in many lands, as well as in Britain, and thought very highly indeed of all such efforts, and especially so of the work carried on by this Society, which was so fruitful in spiritual results.

At the Society's headquarters in London, the fifty-fourth anniversary of the Gospel-Temperance Branch was held last Thursday, and was largely attended by seamen. Testimony was given by many who had been rescued from intemperance, and now are trying to win others to sobriety and godliness. At the close, Rev. G. J. Hill and other workers were long engaged dealing with inquirers, of whom several signed the pledge, and others were led to the Saviour.

Institute for City Postmen.

AT the very moment when the actual move from the old Institute in Goswell Road became necessary, suitable premises were found for the Central Institute for London postmen, three minutes' distance from the General Post Office, and yet away from the noise of the busy thoroughfare, at 17, Bartholomew Close. Colonel Elliot writes: "We are provided with two special rooms for the postmen's use—a sitting-room and a sleeping-room—where these tired men can come in for an hour or two's rest during their busy day. Many of these men live at a long distance from their work, which begins often at an early hour in the morning; and 'We begin tired,' even the young men say. How welcome, then, is the quiet room they can call their own in which to sleep between duties. There is also a handy little tea-room, another for the meetings held at the institute, which include those for city sorters and telegraph clerks, as well as for postmen. There is besides a prayer or rest room open all day for clerks needing a quiet time."

We would thankfully acknowledge (continues the colonel) that the Lord provided in time to take these new rooms the extra funds required; but to keep them going we must again ask his help, and to tell his people of the need. The work is recommended by Mr. A. A. Head and Sir George Williams.

Colonel Elliot is hon. treasurer of the Postal and Telegraph Christian Association Institute (senior branch), and he may be addressed: 17, Bartholomew Close, E.C.

Irish Notes.

A SUCCESSFUL Convention for the deepening of spiritual life was held last week in the Methodist Church, Armagh, and was largely attended. The principal speakers were Revs. R. Cole and Edward Hazelton.

The Dublin Methodist Evangelistic Association is doing an excellent work. During the summer it carried on tent services at two centres, and open-air services at several places in the city. The workers are supplied by the Stephen's Green Methodist Church.

The twenty-seventh anniversary of the Hibernian Band of Hope Union has been observed in Dublin, and the Lord Mayor, Sir Thos. Pile, Bart., gave an "at home" in the Mansion House in connection with it to about 2,000 guests. Amongst the speakers were Mrs. Servante, of London, and Mr. Chas. Wakely, secretary of the United Kingdom Band of Hope Union. The anniversary was very successful.

The Central Presbyterian Association is prospering in Belfast under its energetic secretary, Mr. English. Its programme for the session is a most interesting and attractive one, and includes four lectures on "Some Victories of Peace during the Nineteenth Century," besides various other items calculated to promote the intellectual and spiritual welfare of the members.

It has been resolved to establish several branches of the Ministering Children's League, in which the Countess of Meath takes so deep an interest in Belfast. The objects of the League are to promote kindness, unselfishness, and habits of usefulness among the children in their homes; to encourage children to take an active interest in the needs of their own districts; and to create in the minds of children an earnest desire to help all who are in need.

Irish Methodists are making arrangements to inaugurate the twentieth century by holding in each other's congregations through out the country an Evangelistic Mission early in January or February. The matter is in the hands of a large committee, of which Rev. Charles Inwood, of Belfast, is the convener, and conventions are just now about to be held in various districts in reference to it. The subject is receiving much careful attention, and it is hoped it will result in a deepening of the work of grace in many hearts.

The report of the Central Ireland Mission, of which Rev. William Harpur, of Athlone, is the superintendent, has been issued, and states that during the past eighteen months hundreds of Gospel addresses have been delivered in the fairs and markets of forty-five towns in eighteen of the counties of Ireland. Previous to the period referred to, only about twenty towns in Ireland were open for open-air work, but now almost everywhere the evangelists are listened to with sympathetic interest and attention. This is a truly marvellous change, and Rev. W. T. Cairns, who has seen much of the working of the Mission, writes to say that the efforts have been wisely and lovingly carried on.

A meeting in connection with the establishment of an Inebriate Home near Belfast was held last Thursday evening in the Board Room of the Irish Temperance League, Belfast, under the presidency of Rev. Dr. Spence. It was stated that, during the year 1899, there were 903 persons convicted of drunkenness three times, or upwards, in the Province of Leinster, 249 of these being in Dublin; 1,273 in Munster; 277 in Connaught; and 1,244 in Ulster, of whom 244 were in Belfast. It was reported that £1,000 was still required before the building of the Home could be proceeded with. It was subsequently decided to reques the Lord Mayor of Belfast to summon a public meeting of the citizens to consider the Inebriate Act of 1898, and what steps should be taken in regard to it.

The annual Junior Methodist Ministers' Convention was held in Enniskillen last week, under the chairmanship of Rev. M. J. Lewis, and was largely attended by representatives from various parts of Ireland. The object of this Convention, which has no legislative or administrative powers, is the mental and spiritual improvement of its members. All junior Methodist ministers are eligible for membership, which ceases after a man has been eight years in the ministry. The Convention has been thirteen years in existence, and it is admitted that the meeting just closed is the best of the kind yet held. Rev. Charles Inwood addressed the Convention on the "Simultaneous Mission," and the chairman took for the theme of his Convention sermon, "The Supremacy of Christ." Some of the other subjects discussed were "Impure Literature," "Conscience," and "Missions." Several open-air meetings were also held, and altogether the Convention, in tone and spirit, was most satisfactory. Rev. L. H. Cullen was elected chairman of the next meeting, which is to be held at Maryborough.

Bayswater Convention.

THE annual convention, held recently in Paddington Baths Hall, was blessed to many. The building, which seats about 1,200 people was well filled, and the addresses were listened to with deep attention.

Captain Tottenham presided, and the first speaker was Rev. R. W. Colquhoun. A series of addresses were given at the morning meetings by Rev. G. Campbell Morgan. These proved very helpful, especially the concluding address on "Prayer."

The addresses of Revs. Dr. A. T. Pierson and F. S. Webster were among the striking features of the Conference, while Prebendary Webb-Peploe's convincing appeals caused many to rise, in witness of a desire that their lives should be ruled by Christ. The same speaker also gave a searching address on "Sensual, Sensuous, Natural, and Spiritual Men."

At the concluding meeting the hall was crowded. Rev. R. W. Colquhoun spoke on "Limiting God," and Dr. Pierson followed with a telling address on the words "Satan hindered us." He closed with an impressive appeal to his hearers not to let Satan hinder God, but to claim every department of their being, as the Western settler claims his homestead, by pushing back the boundaries of the primeval forests and bringing its soil under cultivation and into fruitage.

Lady Missionaries to the Jews.

AT the quarterly prayer meeting of the London Society for Promoting Christianity Amongst the Jews held a few days ago, five lady missionaries were bidden God-speed—Miss K. Woosnam, Miss Colley, and Miss Vincent to Jerusalem; Miss Christie to Safed; and Miss Baily to Tunis.

The President (Sir John H. Kennaway, Bart., M.P.) occupied the chair, and dwelt upon the special work which lay before the Society—how through the Zionist Movement God was opening up before them opportunities which they must embrace. The yearning of the Jews for a land and a home of their own must make the Society the more earnest in their efforts to claim God's chosen people for the Saviour. There are three Missions at present without heads — London, Jerusalem, and Constantinople. The Jewish populations in London and Jerusalem are increasing rapidly, and in the latter place it is most important that there should be a thoroughly capable man who, besides superintending the work, could represent the Mission to travellers who go to Jerusalem, and so arouse interest in it. At Constantinople there is a scarcely less important work to be done. Prayer was asked that the right men might be forthcoming to fill these positions.

Rev. F. Paynter, M.A. (Guildford), delivered a valedictory address based on St. Luke i. 17, "to make ready a people prepared for the Lord." Miss Baily, on behalf of herself and the other missionaries, appeared for more helpers.

Christian Union for Social Service.

REPRESENTATIVES and friends of this Union gathered at Lingfield a few days ago, to mark the progress of the Colony in the building of a Home for Epileptic Children, and of a lecture hall. The former building, costing £2,500, is the gift of Mrs. Ruston, of Lincoln, and the generous donor came to lay the memorial stone, accompanied by her son, daughter, and sister.

The dedicatory prayer was offered by Rev. J. W. Horsley, of St. Peter's, Walworth, so well known as a prison chaplain and authority on penology. The lecture hall is a very inexpensive structure built by the colonists (mostly workhouse men), and, according to excellent authority, well built. The first donation towards it was £100 given by Mr. Idiens, of East Grinstead, and the next, a similar gift by Lord Grimthorpe.

Four small memorial stones were laid here, and the ceremony was marked by several substantial contributions towards the cost of furnishing. Rev. E. Bryan, vicar of Lingfield, closed the second part of this interesting service by a prayer of dedication.

An Interesting Jubilee.

THE jubilee of New College, Hampstead, N.W., was held last week, and at the invitation of the Council of the College, all old students were invited to the celebration. About 250 of the 399 who have during the last half century passed through the College responded to the call, and spent a very happy and profitable week together.

The history of the institution was passed in review; reminiscences by ministers representative of the various decades were given; and a valuable conference on possible improvements in the College curriculum was held.

On the Monday evening, Principal Vaughan Pryce, M.A., LL.B., delivered a condensed but pregnant account of the story of the College. Though called New College, its origin is to found in the far-off years of the ejectment of the Nonconforming clergy caused by the Act of Uniformity in 1662. The 2,000 men who then gave up their livings rather than conform to an iniquitous law were passionate believers in an educated ministry, and among the many academies founded by them were those at which such men as Isaac Watts, Philip Doddridge, Archbishop Secker, Bishop Butler, author of the "Analogy of Religion," and others were trained. Homerton College, founded in 1696, Coward College, in 1738, and Highbury College, 1778, were the precursors of New College, which were amalgamated to form it in 1850. Since then Drs. Harris, Halley, and Newth had presided over it, a post ably and sympathically held for the last twelve years by Principal Vaughan Pryce.

Rev. R. T. Verrall, B.A., Chairman of the Council, presided at this gathering, and gave an interesting analysis of the work accomplished, and of the positions filled in the actual ministry and in the Congregational denomination by the various alumni. After detailing the places of honour filled by distinguished students, he said it would be impossible to reckon up the tens of thousands of souls that had been brought into the Kingdom of Heaven through the instrumentality of men trained at New College.

On Tuesday morning Dr. Forsyth, M.A., of Cambridge, preached an eloquent and searching sermon on the text, "That He by the grace of God should taste death for every man" (Heb. ii. 9). He chose this subject of the Atonement, because in such a gathering he felt that he must keep very near to the centre of the faith. After this impressive discourse, a Communion service was held, presided over by Rev. Arnold Thomas, M.A., of Bristol, one of the most distinguished students of the college.

A conference on College Training was held on Wednesday morning, at which Dr. Parker delivered a memorable address on "Preaching," while other brethren discoursed on various aspects of work and worship.

This was followed in the evening at New College Chapel by a paper by Dr. Driver, of Oxford, on "The Place of the Old Testament in Christian Life and Teaching," followed by Principal Whitehouse, of Cheshunt College, on "Christ and the Old Testament," and by Professor W. E. Bennett, M.A., on "The Bible and the Free Churches." The meetings were brought to a close on Thursday morning by further addresses on college training, viewed from the standpoint of the ministry, at which Principal Pryce, Professor Adeney, Rev. E. Griffith-Jones, and others took part.

The week's experiences and conferences were marked by a fine helpful spiritual tone, and all who attended returned to their respective scenes of labour not only refreshed and heartened, but with a new sense of the solemnity and responsibility and the privileges of the sacred office of the ministry.

Sheltering Homes, Liverpool.—Mrs. Birt writes:—The work is being continued this winter, and we have already admitted over 50 very needy cases, including fatherless boys on the verge of ruin and a street life, rescued just in time; little boys and girls, starving and stunted for lack of food and care; and girls from mothers who are setting them the worst of examples. We are striving to guide them to the strait gate that leads to life eternal.

Our Soldiers.

SOLDIERS' HOME, NEWPORT, I.W.

THIS Home for soldiers was started some six years ago, and has been steadily increasing its work, and now another change is needful. Hitherto a caretaker and his wife have proved sufficient, but God is opening the way for extending the influence, and for a lady to take charge. One who has had much experience among our soldiers, and who has the welfare of their souls paramount, has consented to come. This necessitates alterations for further accommodation. The Home is situated between the barracks and the town. Each year the number of attendances has increased. Many letters tell of blessing received, and as we look back realizing "what God hath wrought," we are encouraged to go forward. Funds are urgently needed. Nora Roach, Hon. Sec.

Soldiers' Home, Newport, I.W.

THE DOVER SOLDIERS' HOME.

IN February, 1899, an opportunity arose of purchasing a house for £2,000 which had been used as a Soldiers' Institute, and in which had been sold to soldiers and their friends £600 worth of beer and spirits during the previous year.

The committee of the Home, after much prayerful consideration, felt called upon to buy the house, and thereby secure more suitable premises for their work, and close a drink shop. God has so far blessed our efforts in many ways. £1,360 of the £2,000 has been collected, and the work has developed in many ways. Thirty-three thousand visits have been paid by soldiers to the Home during the past nine months, and the numbers attending the religious and temperance meetings have increased. Letters received from soldiers now serving in South Africa show that the work has not been in vain.

Our income from voluntary contributions and profits from the temperance bar is not large enough to meet the interest on the £640 still needed for the purchase fund, in addition to the working expenses.

H. J. Elverson, Major.
Hon. Treasurer, Dover Soldiers' Home.

CONVALESCENTS FROM THE FRONT.

A HOSPITAL ship and five large transports, full of sick, wounded, and convalescents, have lately poured our brave men from the front into docks, forts, discharge depots, and hospitals, and more are expected in quick succession. Meeting them at docks and also at railway stations after discharge on furlough is part of the work for which our little Soldiers' Home, near Fort Brockhurst, serves as an office and centre.

The compact and healthy eight-roomed villa, within easy reach of Portsmouth, by launch or train, and sufficiently near Netley Station and Southampton Docks, has been used as a Soldiers' Home for convalescents allowed out of the forts, and will be also thrown open as a home for a few discharged disabled men, having neither friends nor home to look to. The work was started originally with the help of a subscription from Miss Robinson, of the Portsmouth Soldiers' Institute.

The hon. secretary visits in three or four of the military hospitals, and one touching request from young fathers lying very ill, some never to recover, is for a little gift or clothing to send to their beloved little ones at home. She would gladly respond to it. Any tokens of sympathy for such cases are much appreciated.

Men discharged on furlough are met as they start for the North and Ireland. A young and practical worker, in full sympathy with the men, is attached to the work in view of the return of the troops, and the present work among convalescents in each department.

Metropolitan Tabernacle Evangelists' Association.

THIS society held its annual meeting on the 30th ult. in the Pastors' College. The chairman, Rev. Thomas Spurgeon, was supported by Pastor C. B. Sawday, Mr. D. F. Matheson (Hackney), and Messrs. T. Cox and C. Matthews. The addresses were earnest and appropriate. From the report it was shown that the Association has been responsible for 2,101 services during the year, conducted in chapels and mission halls in and around London. Statistics from various places proved very encouraging. The outlook is full of hope, with the possibilities of extending the area of the work, and so increasing the usefulness of the society.

Schools and Scholars in China.

FEW evangelizing agencies in China have excited a greater amount of common interest from persons of widely different sympathies than the Church Day Schools of Fuhkien. These are open to the children of the heathen as well as Christians, the former predominating by a large majority. The day school is often the only means that exists in a locality for putting the Gospel before the people. The foreign missionary is not able to visit the village more than once a year; the place is not of sufficient importance to have a resident native clergyman or even a lay reader. Thus the school of the week-day becomes the church of the Sunday.

Rev. F. E. Bland, Principal of the C.M.S. College, Foochow, in a recent communication writes; "I am afraid our friends in England are under the impression that, owing to the general unrest in China, our day-school work is suspended. Such is not the case, I am thankful to say; for, although the missionaries have been called in from the country, the native brethren are continuing the day-schools as usual. Unless funds come in dozens of schools will have to be closed." At present there are about 200 of these village schools in the Province of Fuhkein. Mr. H. G. Malaher, Missionary Leaves Association, 21, Compton Terrace, Islington, N., will be glad to give information respecting the schools.

Orphans in Turkey.

WRITING from Marash, Miss Agnes C. Salmond gives some interesting details of the progress made at the Orphanage. In House No. 1 there are now sixty girls ranging from six to fifteen years. Each girl attends school during the session, and instruction is also given in dressmaking, fancy work, and domestic duties. In House No. 2, spinning and other industries are taught; while in No. 3, looms have been set for teaching rug weaving, and the details connected with the preparation of wool. The deepest interest is taken in the welfare of the lads in the Boys' Home, and the industrial operations are busily maintained. The religious training of both boys and girls is on sound evangelical lines. The meetings of the Christian Endeavour Society, Loyal Legion, &c., are chiefly conducted by the young people. The children give every evidence of promising and useful careers. Their aptness in their studies, and desire to become independent, are constantly manifested. The question of their future, however, often calls for serious consideration, many of them having no prospects apart from those provided by the friends of the institution. Miss Agnes C. Salmond may be addressed—The Orphanage, Marash, Turkey.

What a Little Girl Did.

A LITTLE girl was passing an old prison in Chicago on her way to school, when she saw a hand beckoning from behind a cell window, and heard a weary voice asking her to please bring him something to read.

For many weeks after she went to the prison every Sunday, carrying the poor prisoner a book to read from her father's library. At last, one day, she was called to his deathbed.

"Little girl," said he, "you have saved my soul. Promise me that you will do, all your life, for the poor people of the prison what you have done for me."

The little girl promised, and she kept her promise. Linda Gilbert has been all her life the steadfast friend of the prisoner. She has established good libraries in many prisons, and visited and helped hundreds of prisoners; and from the great number whom she has helped, 600 are now, to her certain knowledge, leading honest lives.

A Bischarin Boy.

WHO is he? What is he? Where does he come from, sitting in the sunshine, his favoured bent stick in front of him, his strings of beads around his neck, and his black hair standing up all over his head? Dressed in a single strip of calico, wound gracefully around his slim, dark figure, little Mohammed, with his merry smile, would answer your question by telling you that he is a Bischarin, and would be delighted to take you along the streets of Assuan, where in five minutes' walk you would meet amid the brilliant lights and colours of the Nile-bank road, half-a-dozen or more of his companions—Abdullah, Said, Jussuf, Ibrahim, Jacub, Isa, and the rest of them.

Among them we are sure to come on pretty Fatima with her string of beads to sell, and a little way off, just through the bazaar, we find the Bischarin village to which they all belong, where we are surrounded in a moment by the keenest, merriest, simplest, proudest, poorest, blackest, and practically heathen throng, we are likely to find anywhere on the track of the European traveller.

The whole village is nothing but a collection of shanties or straw-huts, made of thin grass mats, fastened together and propped up by sticks.

Take this one for a specimen. All the rest are just like it—possibly five feet high in the centre, certainly not more. The roof fixed up in the middle by stick supports, falls away all round to two or three feet from the earth. It has no window and no door, only an open doorway, no furniture, and in fact no room for bed, table, or chair. A rough mound of mud in the centre is used as a seat in the daytime and sleeping place at night. Outside in the sunshine is the kitchen, made by a grass mat or two, tied up against some sticks to keep the wind off the fire which is kindled on the ground. A water jar, some broken bits of earthenware, and a pair of red Egyptian shoes, are lying on the sand, while a few rags tied together, and some water-skins slung to upright sticks, complete the scene.

A European cook would be rather at a loss if asked to prepare dinner here, with no oven, no table, no dresser, no knives or forks, spoons or saucepans, no dairy, larder, store room, or even steve. But Fatima and Mohammed could manage the task with ease, and their parents have contrived to bring up a flourishing family in this tiny house and home.

Here they stand around us—half-a-dozen half-naked vigorous boys, and a sweet-looking mother, dressed in a long black twisted cloth, with a baby in her arms. The old grandmother, sitting on the ground at the hut entrance, is half blind, and feels slowly about among the bits of straw for her small chattels. And here are Fatima and her sisters, bright-eyed girls in brown-grey waist cloths falling to their bare feet, with shawls of the same colour, or rather lack of colour, heavy silver bracelets, bead necklaces, and elaborate coiffures, their black hair plastered flatly to the tops of their heads, and tightly plaited below into innumerable tiny braids, which hang in scores and dozens round their necks.

We notice a silver ring in the nose of one pretty laughing creature.

"That's because wife," remarks Mohammed.

"See, that's not married," he pursues, pointing out another, who, minus this distinction, evidently understands and looks smilingly self-conscious.

The crowd buzzes around us with talk, laughter, and interest. All the men—who are simply larger and older editions of Mohammed—wear the same dress as he does, a single strip of cotton cloth, perhaps 15 feet long, wound round them something in the style of old Greek costume, with one end pendant from the shoulder and variously employed as a fan, screen, umbrella, hood, duster, pillow, sack, &c., according to the passing moment's need.

Standing among them here, our thoughts travel beyond their village—which itself is 100 miles away from the nearest foreign mission station—to the immense country reaching all the way from the Red Sea to the Nile banks, and from lower Egypt up to the hills of Abyssinia, over which these tribesmen travel, and in which they dwell. There are no less than 100 such wandering Bedouin tribes in the Egyptian desert, to none of whom is the Gospel preached. Moslems in name, but in practice almost without a religion, they are ready to be taught of God—"as sheep without a shepherd."

The railway runs the whole way up from Cairo to Assuan in twenty-four hours. The desert hills around this grass-hut village echo every day to the sound of passing trains, in which for a few shillings anyone may travel. Any amount of goods—necessities and luxuries of life—may be brought here without difficulty. And within a week of this spot one can be in England; within a week from England one can be here.

Will you pray that missionaries may come to seek the Bischarin—lost sheep of the Great Shepherd? (Friends interested in this matter may communicate with Uncle Tom.)

WHAT INTEMPERANCE COSTS OUR NATION (Prov. xxiii. 1-7; 15-21.)

THE wise man warns us against gluttony, especially when we sit at the table of the rich. It is desirable that those who take such strong grounds against intemperance in drink, should see that they are not betrayed into a similar intemperance in food. Probably we could dispense with more than half of the medical men now in existence if people took the advice here tendered. To eat three heavy meals a day, besides lunch at eleven, tea at five, and supper at ten, is sufficient to break down the most robust constitution, and it is sad to think of the amount of time expended on elaborate dinners, in which course succeeds course, whilst the poor are starving, and India is crying out for help. What a story could be told by the waiters at the great hotels, and municipal dinners.

With equal solicitude we are warned against wearying to be rich and having fellowship with those who have an evil eye, an expression which probably refers to those who lie in wait to take an advantage of the unwary (Deut. xv. 9). These two cautions need careful pondering, for in our endeavour to get on in this world we are often tempted to sacrifice all other interests in our one desire to amass wealth, and are not always very particular as to the company we keep, if only it may prove of assistance in our main quest. The one safeguard for young men and women, and for us all, is to be in the fear of the Lord all the day long (v. 17). This is the Old Testament way of expressing our Lord's command, Abide in Me, and I in you. It means what the Apostle enjoins: "Walk in the Spirit, and ye shall not fulfil the lusts of the flesh." When a man is walking calmly, quietly, and steadfastly in the fear of God, he is perpetually engaged in converse with his Creator and Redeemer. He does not weary to get rich, but waits for God to give him what is necessary. He falls no longer an abject prey to evil companions; his hope is in God, and his expectation from Him.

Let us specially be on our guard against Intemperance, which is wasting every year a fabulous treasure in grain, labour, wealth, human lives, the happiness of homes, the peace of conscience, and the eternal blessedness of myriads. It is almost impossible to conceive what this world might become if only the demon of strong drink were bound by a mighty chain, and cast into the bottomless pit. There would be no longer slums in our great cities, poverty, privation, the wan faces of little children, the terror-stricken screams of ill-treated women, the sodden faces of armies of drunkards. The destruction of native races would be exchanged for prosperity and peace. Nature would cease to travail, and the earth, relieved of the greatest curse that has ever lain upon her, would sing in the choir of creation as of old. Let every young life guard itself from the contagion of this evil. Determine never to touch strong drink, or be a party to its distribution, nor use money which has been obtained by it, nor engage in business which deals in it, nor transact bargains under the bribe and fascination which it exercises. Let us avoid the very company of wine-bibbers, and yield ourselves to the Spirit of God; for, as the apostle suggests, they who are filled with the Spirit obtain all the exhilaration and sense of power that wine gives to the body. It is good to abstain from alcohol, but it is better to be infilled with the Holy Ghost, that He may not only restrain us from evil, but inspire us to high and noble living.

C.E. NOTES.

At the great meeting recently held in Edinburgh for the union of the two great Scottish Churches, it is interesting to notice that the National Scottish Christian Endeavour banner was among the decorations of the enormous meeting-place, and hung alongside the genuine Covenanting flags of long ago. The banner was referred to by Dr. Laws, of Livingstonia, who spoke a word of hearty commendation of our movement.

The Christian Endeavourers in one denomination in America have been for eleven years building home mission churches. Last year their record stood in all at twelve churches—called proudly Christian Endeavour Churches. The latest report shows fifteen churches to their credit, besides a Christian Endeavour station at Chittore, India, with fifteen out-stations, wholly sustained by Endeavour offerings, and work aided in Oklahoma, China, Japan, and Arabia.

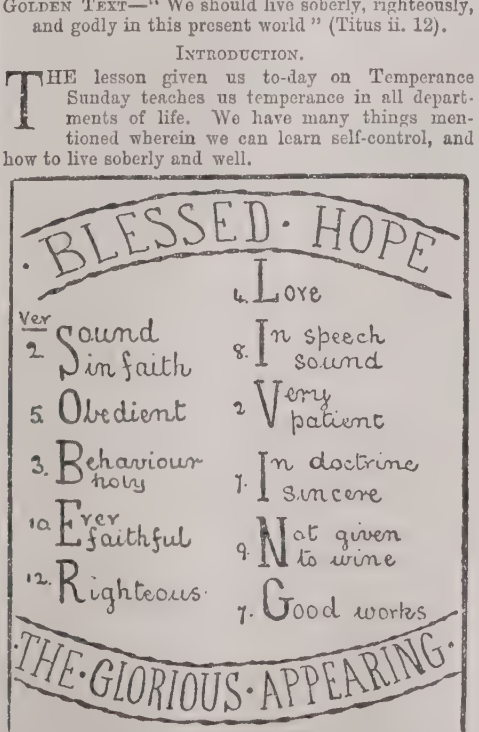
SOBER LIVING (Titus ii. 1-15).

GOLDEN TEXT—"We should live soberly, righteously, and godly in this present world" (Titus ii. 12).

INTRODUCTION.

THE lesson given us to-day on Temperance Sunday teaches us temperance in all departments of life. We have many things mentioned wherein we can learn self-control, and how to live soberly and well.



Key to Blackboard Plan.—"Sober living," what it is, is shown above, and the motive for so living, "The Blessed Hope of his glorious appearing." If we are not to be ashamed at his appearing (1 John ii. 28), then we must endeavour to carry out sober living as given in our portion to-day.

1. TO WHAT PEOPLE ARE THESE INSTRUCTIONS GIVEN?

To four classes:—(2) Aged men.
(3) Aged women.
(6) Young men.
(4) Young women.

Perhaps the children may say they are not included; but indeed they are, for none of these four classes could form the sober-living character unless they begin quite young as boys and girls. It is in childhood the roots for future living are started. Begin at once, none are too young.

2. WHAT IS SOBER LIVING?

It is to live out our "blackboard plan" (find the reference from the portion for each word); It is to live the Christ-life; it is to do what we know Jesus would have us do; it is to have a well-formed character; it is to bring forth the fruit of the Spirit, as given in Gal. v. 22, 23; it is to lead a "holy" life, remembering "without holiness no man can see the Lord" (Heb. xii. 14). All the things Paul recommended to Titus will fall in with the above suggestions. We can test our characters by each word, and see if we are carrying it out in our every-day lives.

Notice the word "sober" is used to all—aged men (2), aged women (3), young women (4), young men (6), and it means "self-control." The word "sound" is noticeable too. Sound doctrine (1), sound faith (2), sound speech (8).

3. WHAT IS THE MOTIVE FOR SO DOING?

(13) Because Christ is coming again; and because He told us to be ready for his coming (Matt. xxiv. 44).

Work out in the New Testament the subject of the second coming of Christ. Whole of 1 Thess. and 2 Thess.; 2 Pet. iii. 12; &c.

How are you living?

Personalia.

Mr. W. C. PARKINSON, L.C.C., who is the treasurer of the Antwerp Sailors' Rest, intimates a change of his address, which now is Carleton House, Hillfield Avenue, Hornsey, N.

REV. J. LEWIS, of Brockley Road Baptist Chapel, is receiving much encouragement in his work, which shows many signs of spiritual prosperity. At a recent church gathering the labours of both Mr. and Mrs. Lewis received suitable recognition.

Mr. IRA D. SANKEY, while travelling in England, has received the interesting news that he is a grandfather. The little visitor (a daughter) has entered the home of the famous singer's second son, Mr. Ira Allan Sankey, who was born in Scotland in 1874, and now resides in Brooklyn, N.Y. Mr. Ira Allan Sankey is president of the well-known publishing house, the Biglow and Main Company.

Japanese Sailors.—Miss McLean, of the Japanese Christian Institute, Tilbury Dock, Essex, is in need of book bags for distributing among Japanese sailors visiting this country. Some 260 are required for immediate use, and a similar number in a few weeks. Miss McLean writes that there are various open doors in this work for consecrated ladies of independent means, who on communication with her would be referred to spheres of much usefulness.

Noon Prayer Meeting.—The Week of Prayer for young men was inaugurated at Aldersgate Street Y.M.C.A. on Monday last by Rev. F. B. Meyer, who based his address on Gen. xviii. 16-19 and xix. 27. Dealing with the subject of prayer, Mr. Meyer said it must be definite dealing with God. We do well to lay our affairs expectantly before God and "talk them out" as with a friend. Mr. Meyer gave a number of instances in which spiritual awakenings followed on prayer, and went on to show that as a preliminary to revival, members of Christian churches must prepare themselves, and be orthodox in life as well as creed.

SCOTLAND.

At the annual conversazione of the Pollokshaws branch of the National Sabbath-School Union, Bailie W. F. Anderson occupied the chair. Suggestive addresses were delivered on the various phases and departments of Sunday-school work.

The secretary of the Monthly Visitor Tract Society stated at a meeting in Edinburgh last week that the distribution within the city now amounted to 58,000 copies monthly, the distributors numbering considerably over 1,000. Some parts of the city were, he said, still unoccupied by the Society's workers.

Lady Clementine Hay has addressed a letter to the Sabbath-school children of Scotland, describing the work done by the Children's League of Pity, and appealing for further sympathy and help on behalf of little ones who are suffering from the results of cruelty and neglect. The League has 4,000 members.

Mr. Quarrier announces the close of the thirty-sixth year of "our work among poor children, and the twenty-ninth of our trust in God for the supply of all our needs." Including the consumptive sanatoria, the annual needs, for upkeep alone, of the institutions at Bridge of Weir now amount to £8,000.

The Glasgow City Mission has for some years found its income inadequate to meet the regular outlay; and is now appealing for an increase of at least £500 in the annual amount of donations, all of which will be required to maintain the work of the present staff (thirty missionaries) in a state of efficiency. In spite of the enormous increase of population in the city and suburbs, no attempt at expansion has been possible for many years.

At the recent opening, by the Church Army, of a new Labour Home in Edinburgh, the Lord Provost, Sir Mitchell Thomson, paid a high tribute to the enterprise of the Episcopal Church in inaugurating these Homes, and thus giving expression to the practical side of Christianity. As chief magistrate, he acknowledged the great value of such institutions to the city, and the help they afford to those who are charged with the administration.

While the poor children of Glasgow enjoy summer holidays under the auspices of the Fresh Air Fortnight Fund, every effort is made to develop a spirit of mutual helpfulness, the stronger helping the weaker; and all who show themselves useful in this way are enrolled as members of the "Sunshine Band." On the afternoon of Saturday, November 3, a rally of the members of this band was held, when about 1,100 boys and girls came together to renew their bond of union.

Rev. Dr. James Wells (Pollokshields, Glasgow), has just set out on a tour of about four months in India, in the course of which it is his hope to visit all, or nearly all, the mission stations of the United Free Church of Scotland there, and to address meetings of the English-speaking young men in the large cities. His daughter, Miss Jenny Wells—now married to Rev. Dr. J. M. Macphail, of Santali Chaki—was one of the first lady medical graduates of Glasgow University, and went to India immediately after as a missionary.

At the annual conference of the Scottish branches of the Railway Mission in Glasgow, under the presidency of Mr. James Grieve, the delegates brought highly satisfactory reports from all quarters at home; and Mr. William Hill gave an account of the good work that is being carried on by the Mission in India. From the report it appeared that the conference was the most successful ever held in Glasgow, there being thirty-five branches represented. The number of branches in the United Kingdom is now 365, seventy of which are in Scotland, and five in Glasgow.

So great was the dearth of students for the ministry of the Established Church presenting themselves at St. Andrew's University for the current session, that only four men sat down to the examination by which the holding of twelve bursaries or foundations ought to have been settled. This state of affairs was partly remedied by the transference of students from Glasgow; but the proportion of scholarships is still so much out of proportion to the number of persons eligible to hold them, that several of the professors are in favour of steps being taken to secure the transference of some of the foundations from the faculty of theology to that of medicine.

One of the first outstanding results of the rupture which has taken place in some of the Free Church congregations in the Highlands, arising out of opposition to the union with the United Presbyterian Church, is that it has been found necessary to postpone the evangelistic campaign among Highlanders resident in Glasgow, which the Highland and Open-Air Mission had planned to carry out during the present winter in conjunction with the Highland Committee of the Church. It was intended that the meetings should begin on Lord's Day of last week, but it was found that the unrest among congregations in the North was increasing to such an extent that several Gaelic-speaking ministers who had promised to take part did not feel at liberty to go from home in the meantime.

The falling off among students for the ministry has been pressed once more on the attention of the Established Church by the small number of such entrants this year at the universities. Referring to the subject a few days ago, Professor Cooper thought one cause was to be found in the giving up of the teaching of Greek in many parishes; but added that the true cause must be found deeper, and that possibly it lay in the flagging enthusiasm of young men for the Church. Something seemed to be needed to revive a spiritual flame, and, for himself, he could conceive of nothing so inspiriting—apart, of course, from devotion to Christ Himself—as the vision of one great Presbyterian Church, comprising all the Presbyterians of Scotland, England, Ireland, America, and the Colonies.

At a meeting of the Dundee magistrates last week, Bailie Urquhart strongly urged the claims on the community of Rev. W. Blumenreich, who has for a number of years acted as police court missionary. It was explained that he in no way interfered with the Prison Aid Society in their dealings with discharged prisoners, his efforts being directed rather in the direction of the prevention of crime. In cases continued by magistrates for a period of probation, his help as guide and counsellor had been attended by the most beneficial results, and quite a number of households are known to have been revolutionised. The fallen women of the city had been the objects of special solicitude, and in numerous instances poor girls had been restored to their homes in Edinburgh, Glasgow, and elsewhere. The magistrates were of one mind as to the great value of the services rendered, and—though no precedent could be found for the act, and grave doubt as to its legality was expressed—it was agreed to vote Mr. Blumenreich, during the pleasure of the Town Council, an honorarium of £50, to be used in connection with his work.

Feeble Minded Girls.—The Yorkshire Home for training young girls of dull intellect is situate at Shibden, near Halifax. Only girls of good character, from fourteen to twenty years of age, and able to work, are admitted. A medical certificate is required, and payments of six shillings per week in advance, also travelling expenses and an ordinary outfit. The Home is managed by a general committee of Guardians and other prominent workers, elected from the principal towns in Yorkshire. The Home is certified by the Local Government Board for fifteen girls. Anyone collecting £15 12s. a year, or assuming responsibility for that sum, can nominate a girl for acceptance by the committee. Forms of application can be obtained from the honorary secretary, Miss Waite, Park Road, Halifax.

Glasgow United Y.M.C.A.

The seventy-sixth annual meeting of the Glasgow United Y.M.C.A., held last Friday, was a most successful gathering.

The Chairman (Mr. W. A. Campbell) spoke with a grateful heart of the measure in which Mr. and Mrs. W. M. Oatts had experienced the blessing of God in their work in India and the Colonies since saying farewell a year ago; and found an augury of great promise for the future of the Association in the excellent beginning which had been made by the new secretary, Mr. C. R. Irving. The most serious drawback in the present condition of the work lay, he thought, in the small average attendance at branch meetings compared with the membership. This he feared was one of a number of indications of a decline in interest and lethargy in spiritual things, not only in the Y.M.C.A., but throughout the country. He pleaded earnestly for attention to this matter, and pointed out the aims to be kept in view—the seeking of life more abundant, setting others on fire if we have the true heat within us, above all the seeking of the energizing of the Holy Ghost.

The annual report showed the membership to be 7,006 (average attendance 3,658), with a young women's auxiliary of 1,786; the fellowship meetings number 210, and lodging-house meetings seven, while the monthly circulation of The Guide is now about 5,000—income for the past year had amounted to £11,315, expenditure £11,858, leaving a deficit of £543. The adoption of the report was moved by Rev. Thomas Martin (successor to Dr. Marshall Lang in Barony Parish Church), who pointed out the great value of the comradeship and brotherhood fostered in the Association, in the dark hour of battle against common temptations and sins; and also the great lesson in Christian unity which the Y.M.C.A. has been giving to the Churches for more than two generations. The seconder of the report (Rev. Ambrose Shepherd, Elgin Place Church) spoke of the great things to be done through a "consecrated audacity for Christ" among the members. "Find the centre of your life in Jesus Christ, plant your compass there, and sweep as big a circle as you can, the bigger the better, till you take in all human affairs, and annex the whole of humanity."

"After Christ" was the motto of an address from Rev. George Jackson, by which the hearts of the audience were deeply stirred. As writers, painters, musicians only attain excellence by studying their masters long and earnestly, so the members of the Y.M.C.A. ought to "study the Master," and thereby get "back to Christ," finding power in doing so. Rev. W. A. Walton (Paisley) followed, and closing words were spoken by Mr. Duncan M. West (Glasgow President) and Mr. James Sinclair (Scottish President).

The Shipwrecked Mariners' Society having been compelled, owing to the effect of the war funds, &c., to sell £6,000 Consols in order to meet the current demands for relief, the secretary (Mr. G. E. Maude, 26, Suffolk Street, Pall Mall East, London) has received from a well-known firm of solicitors in Lincoln's Inn Fields a cheque for £500 on behalf of a client whose name they are not allowed to divulge, to assist the society in its necessity.

Common Lodging Houses.—In the common lodging houses of the East-End of London, some 10,000 poor people are ministered to by workers of the London City Mission, while in Westminster 1,000 adults listen, in the kitchens, to the Gospel every Sunday night. Men have come boldly out and confessed Christ; numbers have been assisted to start lives of respectability and usefulness; and wanderers and prodigals have been searched out and restored to their friends.

The Y.W.C.A.—The Scottish Divisional Conference at Dundee was attended by over 100 delegates. Miss Murray, vice-president, gave an account of the work done among the women employed at the herring fishing in Aberdeen and Wick. Sir W. Ogilvy Dalgleish, presided at the twelfth anniversary of the Dundee Association, when the Hon. E. Kinnaird gave an address. The membership of the Scottish Y.W.C.A. is 19,000, comprising 330 branches, with 66 junior branches. Y.W.C.A work is shortly to be commenced in Pretoria, Johannesburg, and other places.

Successful Scottish Missions.

At a meeting recently held at Glasgow in the interests jointly of the foreign missions of Free and United Presbyterian Churches, the spiritual and practical results which may be expected as the outcome of the union of the Churches were brought home to a great audience which crowded St. Andrew's Hall in every part. Referring to the last command of our Lord, the chairman (Lord Provost Chisholm) said that, however far all our Churches might be from having realized that ideal, the standard has been caught sight of, and can never be forgotten again; he called for a new conception of duty in the matter of giving, and expressed the opinion that the United Free Church should set before it a quarter of a million as the annual income to be aimed at from the beginning for the missionary work to which it has given itself.

The missionaries who spoke had each a story of advance in numbers, and of progress in grace on the part of the converts. Speaking about educational work in India, Principal Mackichan, Bombay, said that in their schools and colleges the Gospel was being brought to bear upon and preached as simply and frankly as it is in any church at home. Referring to "the kind of Christianity which is being planted," he said there were within the circle of his acquaintance native Christians, "whose character would do honour to any church in Christendom; men whose spirituality of life and aim would compare with the highest spirituality known to us men to whom I would sooner go in spiritual trouble, or for spiritual counsel and help, than to any other men in any other part of the world. There is a sense of the presence of God, not conventional, but real and living, which we might well incorporate in the Christianity of the West." He touched on the terrible ravages of the famine, and was followed by Rev. Dr. Husband, C.I.E. (Rajputana), who tried to point out something of God's purposes in the great visitation. First among these he named the way in which it had drawn Christians together, and caused all denominational distinctions to disappear; then he referred in glowing terms to the way in which prejudice and jealousy had been disarmed, as the outcome of which he believed that long after the effects of the famine have passed away between missionaries and people will remain.

Africa was represented by Rev. Donald Fraser (Livingstonia), who held his hearers under a spell as he told them of the triumphs of the Cross in that Continent—"a marvellous manifestation of God's creative power, in nations entering with joy into a land of peace and goodwill." On the other hand, he described the days of "heat and dust" through which this point had been reached, and the graves of missionaries which were the milestones on the road to the redemption of Africa. After quoting figures of progress during the past twenty-five years, his cry was, "There is no doubt about God's approval of the work; but the triumphs won are only pointing out larger responsibilities."

The story of the sufferings of the native church of China fell to be told by Rev. Dr. Ross (Moukden), whose field of work in Manchuria has, during recent years, been the scene of the greatest revival of modern times. Through their fiery trial the Christians have been steadfast. In closing, he said the progress made had been so great, that, if the number of missionaries could be doubled (making one to every half million of population), it could be arranged that every man and woman in Manchuria should, within the next ten or fifteen years, have a full and intelligent opportunity of accepting or rejecting the Saviour.

An unexpected feature of the gathering was the appearance of Rev. Dr. John G. Paton, who brought the fraternal greetings of the New Hebrides Presbytery and of the Australian Presbyterian Churches.

University Notes.

[From our own Correspondents.]

CAMBRIDGE.

The Ely Diocesan Branch of the C.E.T.S. is appealing for more money. "The income has shown distressing signs of falling off" in spite of what is claimed for the branch—"increased and untiring activity and extended usefulness in the diocese." There is danger that unless money is forthcoming its work must be curtailed.

Two stirring addresses were given at recent meetings of the University Church Missionary Union on October 26 by Rev. A. E. Richardson, who spoke on the difficulties in connection with Hausaland; and on November 2 by Dr. H. Lankester, who spoke on "The Place of Medical Missions in the Evangelization of the World." The meetings, which are held in the Henry Martyn Memorial Hall, have been well attended this term.

Rev. J. Harford-Battersby has been appointed vicar of Holy Sepulchre in place of Rev. P. R. Allnutt, who has resigned through ill-health. This appointment will not interfere with Mr. Battersby's position as Vice-Principal of Ridley Hall.

Professor Handley Moule is giving a course of four devotional addresses on Doctrine to members of the University in Trinity Church. On October 29 and November 5 his subject was, "The Church." "The Christian Ministry" was opened on November 12, to be continued on 19th inst.

The Inter-Collegiate Christian Union was addressed on Sunday, November 4, by Rev. Talbot Rice, M.A. It is hoped next Sunday Dr. Barnardo will speak. These meetings are well attended, not only by those who already really know Christ, but also by many others. Will all those who are interested in the University pray earnestly that there may be an abundant blessing on these weekly meetings?

There is much active work amongst men in Cambridge. On the first Sunday afternoon of each month the vicar of Holy Trinity (Rev. C. T. Procter) has a very large congregation, drawn, doubtless, from all over Cambridge. Active work, too is being carried on in St. Barnabas' and St. Paul's parishes. A series of monthly services for men only will also shortly be started in Barnwell parish church.

OXFORD.

Oxford Auxiliary of the Bible Society held its annual meeting in the Town Hall on Monday, the Bishop of Hereford presiding. Rev. H. G. Grey, Principal of Wycliffe Hall, and Rev. J. R. Ritson, secretary of the parent society, were the speakers. Among those on the platform were Professors Margoliouth and Sanday. Mr. Grey's address was full of hopefulness for India, and he illustrated the power of the Word of God from his work at Lahore. He anticipates a great spreading of Christianity in Afghanistan, as many of the Mollahs are secretly studying the Scriptures.

The Bishop of Bath and Wells preached in St. Mary's on Tuesday in connection with the Bi-Centenary of the S.P.G. He mentioned the three great ties that united nations together, the community of race, interest, and religion, and he believed the last-named was far greater than statesmen were always willing to allow. The rapidity of the growth of the Anglo-Saxon race far exceeded in ratio that of any other people, and they had powers of colonization superior to those of any other nation. These constituted a trust and a responsibility which the Society was doing its best to carry out.

Bishop Mitchinson, Master of Pembroke, convened a meeting in the College Hall on Saturday evening in connection with the Edinburgh Medical Missions. Rev. E. C. Dawson, biographer of Bishop Hannington, and Drs. E. Sargood Fry, Landsborough, and Smith attended as a deputation, and gave addresses on the work in China, India, and Formosa. Dr. Fairbairn and Rev. Canon Christopher also spoke, and about fifty undergraduates were present. Dr. Smith has just come from China, and gave a graphic account of the bombardment of Tientsin, where he was stationed until the relief. He told the meeting how his wife, on her dying bed, urged him to go to the mission-field. Dr. Fry said the medical missionary had four passions: (1) for the truth, (2) for the Christ, (3) for the souls of men, and (4) for self-sacrifice.

Speaking of the "Hooligans" in a sermon at St. Peter-le-Bailey last Sunday evening, Bishop Mitchinson said he feared they were to be found in other places besides London, and asked, Could the Church do nothing for them? Surely these lads were Christ's lambs, if very wayward ones. Speaking from the words, "Being crafty, I caught you with guile" (2 Cor. xii. 16), the Bishop urged these lads were the most delicate souls to catch, and sanctified wisdom was sorely needed to win them. The Church Lads' Brigade, for which he pleaded, was one of the ways in which the Church could deal with the question.

A Mission Band Reunion.

It was stimulating to mingle with the numerous earnest and youthful souls taking part in last Saturday's anniversary of the Central London Mission Band. The gatherings were held in the Wesleyan Church, St. John's Square, E.C., and were remarkable for the ardent enthusiasm of the workers, and the hopeful and encouraging testimony heard on every hand, concerning the quickened spiritual life which has marked the past year. It is obvious that the numerous organizations at work are conducted with an intelligent sympathy with the needs of those to be reached, and a humble faith in the power of God to own and use the efforts put forth in his name. In fact the whole of the varied ministry of the Mission Band is marked by earnest persistency and untiring devotion.

Prior to the tea, Rev. F. B. Meyer addressed some wise and hearty words to the workers. His appeal was to the heart rather than to the head—a call to self-surrender to the power and influence of the Holy Spirit. The proceedings were continued after tea in the church, and the meeting sustained the same spirit of cordial fellowship that had marked the previous gathering. Mr. Wm. Edges, of Ealing, as chairman, spoke in warm terms of the work which is being accomplished through the agencies of the Church. Mr. Chas. Barnett detailed the services rendered by the Mission Band, which are varied and extensive. Every Sunday night companies are engaged, comprising tract distributors in seventy districts, and Button-hole, Public-house, and Lodging-house Brigades. Three hundred workers are thus continuously rendering that service to the Church of God, which is born of and sustained by love to Christ and sympathy with needy men.

Rev. Dinsdale T. Young's address was both impressive, encouraging, and appreciative of the progressive organizations which cluster around the church in St. John's Square. In a few homely remarks Rev. John Wakerley reviewed the labours of the Mission Band, and heartily acknowledged the devoted labours of his numerous helpers, in not only persuading men and women to attend the House of God, but in taking the Gospel to those who pray to be excused. Of the Sunday afternoon teas for destitute and homeless men, Mr. Wakerley had some cheering experiences to relate. Madame Annie Ryall sang at both meetings.

The Y.M.C.A.

The extensions in connection with the Cape Town Association are making good progress. The new buildings are being proceeded with. The total cost of the site and buildings will amount to £22,000. The foundation-stone was laid by Sir Alfred Milner, who said it would be an impertinence to descant on the merits of the Y.M.C.A., which covered the face of the globe, and had played so great a part in the social life of the nations; such an association required no praise nor commendation from him or any other man. The Bishop of Ballarat, Mr. W. Gordon Sprigg (sec.), and many others took part in the function.

Mr. Swanston Smith is severing his connection with the Camden Road Association. For the past eight or nine years in the office of secretary, and for some years previous to that time as hon. secretary, Mr. Smith has worked conscientiously for the welfare of the members. A number of friends are combining to present Mr. Smith with a token of their appreciation of his services. Mr. G. H. Harris, hon. sec., sends particulars of a recent gathering at which Mr. J. W. Ross spoke on "The Pilgrim's Progress," and read some passages therefrom with much acceptance.

The Bristol Association has made arrangements to hold a number of social gatherings in its large hall for the reception of soldiers on their return from South Africa. The scheme has the cordial support of the local military authorities.

The Returning Troops.—The appeals of Lord Wolseley and Lord Roberts in the interests of the soldiers now returning have been issued in poster form, boldly displayed and printed by the Church of England Temperance Society, 4, Sanctuary, Westminster, S.W. (9d. per dozen, 4s. per 100.) The same society have also published numerous pamphlets directing words of sound warning and timely counsel to the men. (1s. per 100.)

Evangelistic.

Rev. G. Campbell Morgan at Holloway.

A WEEK'S mission has been conducted at Holloway Chapel, Camden Road, by Rev. G. Campbell Morgan, who preached to crowded congregations. During the mission upwards of sixty persons signified their decision for Christ. The afternoon Bible readings and Conferences, conducted by Mr. Morgan, were very largely attended, and proved a source of blessing to many. Sister Louie, R.A.M., contributed much to the good effect of the mission by her rendering of Gospel songs.

Mr. Charles Inglis at Bacup.

Mr. C. Inglis has been holding a twelve days' mission in the town of Bacup. God has abundantly answered prayer. Large numbers of people heard the Gospel, and a good many anxious ones were dealt with in the inquiry rooms. Bible readings were made a blessing to the Christians who attended them, and regret was expressed that the mission could not continue. Mr. Inglis's lantern lecture on the last night was delivered to a crowded audience.

Haddon Hall, Bermondsey.

A six-days' mission at Haddon Hall, Bermondsey, has been conducted by Mr. W. Olney and Mr. F. Spencer Johnson; the latter sang the Gospel. Among other happy souls rejoicing in a new-found Saviour were the mother of a church member, several men (one with his wife), and two or three senior scholars. Every night young inquirers were dealt with in the front room, while the adult service was commenced in the Hall. Many children and young people have handed in a "Decision Card," professing repentance and faith in Christ.

Weaver Brothers in Sunderland.

It is now seventeen months since the last visit of these missioners to the town, and many of the converts of the last mission welcomed their return visit with joy. Tatham Street Church is one of the largest in the Primitive Methodist Connexion, and from the first Sunday the huge edifice was crowded. From the first service there were tokens of the Divine presence. The meetings were characterized by great solemnity and deep spiritual power. Every meeting the inquiry room was filled with souls seeking light.

The Brothers Cotelingam.

The Brothers Cotelingam have held a nine days' mission at Weston-super-Mare. The week-night meetings were held in Victoria Hall, and on the Sundays services were arranged in Wadham Street Baptist Church. At the last service in Victoria Hall hundreds were unable to gain admission. The visit, which was in connection with the Y.M.C.A., aroused much interest. Among the chief features of the mission was a lecture on "Caste Customs, Ceremonies, and Superstitions of India, and the Spiritual Outlook." The concluding service was held in the Baptist Church, the hall previously arranged for proving too small to accommodate those anxious to be present. A meeting was also held at Wellington.

Mr. Spiers at Leslie, N.B.

A mission to children, conducted by Mr. Spiers, of the C.S.S.M., has been brought to a close, greatly to the sorrow of the young people and others who attended. During the fortnight the mission lasted there was an average nightly attendance of boys and girls of 300, besides a number of ministers, Sabbath-school teachers, and other Christian workers, while about 120 remained to an after meeting, and were spoken to about their souls' salvation. A goodly number of the young professed to have taken Christ as their Saviour and to be trusting his Word. Several adults also have professed their faith in Christ, while Christians have had their souls revived. The mission is to be followed up for a time by a weekly meeting with the young. J. Alexander.

Mr. W. R. Lane at Shrewsbury.

A mission has just been held in the picturesque old town of Shrewsbury by Mr. W. R. Lane, under the auspices of the Evangelical Free Church Council, from October 28 to November 5. By the guidance, as cannot be doubted, of the Holy Spirit, a convention for the deepening of spiritual life had preceded the mission, thus fitting and equipping a band of workers for the task of dealing with anxious souls.

On the Thursday night the workers were too few to cope with the number of inquirers who desired their sympathy and help, in St. John's Hill Wesleyan Church. The closing meeting, held in the Congregational Church, Abbey Foregate, did not break up, nor did the workers leave the inquiry-room, until 11 p.m., after the singing of the Doxology, in fervent manifestation of the presence and power of the Holy Ghost.

An evident token of this, and at the same time a most delightful note of the mission, was that Episcopalians and members of the Evangelical Free Churches were seen working side by side and uniting in praise and prayer. W. R. T.

Dr. Harry Guinness in Dublin.

Dr. H. Guinness has been conducting a mission during the past fortnight, in the Metropolitan Hall, Dublin. God upheld his servant, even as He did, in other days, the beloved father and mother, of the evangelist. The mission was organised by a committee representing all evangelical denominations. The meeting for men, presided over by Sir Philip Smyly, M.D., was a time never to be forgotten. The great audience listened with rapt attention, and a large number responded to the invitation to meet Dr. Guinness in the inquiry room. Many professed to yield to the Saviour. Night after night the Gospel was preached with fulness and power. Hundreds were dealt with in the after-meetings.

Bible readings were given each afternoon, and Christians testified to blessing received, as some of the qualifications for the "Divine art of soul-winning" were indicated by Dr. Guinness. Each Sunday crowded congregations have gathered in the Presbyterian Church (Rev. S. Prenter), and the Baptist Chapel (Pastor H. D. Brown), while Dr. Guinness sought to lead Christians into fuller blessing. At one of the closing meetings, "How can I obey the great commission?" was the subject chosen, and many hearts were stirred to new missionary enthusiasm. W.

Rev. Henry Montgomery in London.

On Sunday last Rev. Henry Montgomery commenced a ten days' mission at Camden Road Presbyterian Church, N.W. (Rev. Dr. Thornton's). In the evening the capacious building was well filled, and the congregation listened with deep attention to Mr. Montgomery's powerful address.

The missioner's many qualifications for evangelistic work were obvious. His deep sympathy with the spiritual difficulties of his hearers, and his thoroughness in dealing with sin, won him the affection and esteem of the audience. Mr. Montgomery's address was founded on the words, "So great salvation." He gave many telling illustrations, and in the course of an appeal, specially directed to the younger people present, drew some stimulating lessons from the biography of notable men, concluding with a vivid sketch of the conversion and career of the late Sir S. Arthur Blackwood. During the evening, Miss Lucy Montgomery sang "Throw out the life line," and "I shall know Him," with clearness and pathos. At the conclusion of the address, Mr. Montgomery met the young men of the congregation in the adjacent lecture hall, while Dr. Thornton proceeded with the prayer meeting in the church. Meetings will be held nightly this week (except on Saturday), and there will be three services on Sunday next.

Stafford Rooms Y.M.C.A.

This well-known place in Titchborne Street, Edgware Road, is historic in connection with the revival times of thirty to forty years ago, when many hundreds of men were there brought to God, who are now witnessing for Christ in different parts of the world, whilst not a few have passed to their rest and reward above. It was here that some of the earliest fruits of the great revival movement were reaped when the late Mr. Henry Hull was secretary. The good work continued under the secretaryship of Mr. C. Russell Hurditch, who undertook it at the express wish of Mr. Hull, and the unanimous invitation of the committee.

The work has since continued with varying success under successive secretaries. The workers have laboured on in faith and hope in the belief that God would revive his work, and some gracious indications of this were seen in the mission for young men held last week by Mr. Philip Russell Hurditch, the second son of the former secretary. Mr. Hurditch is full of vigour, forcing home his arguments in such a manner that men are at once led to apprehend the soul's great need. The mission was commenced on Sunday, November 4, and found a considerably increased number of young men present in the afternoon, and the same at the 8.30 p.m. Gospel meeting. These numbers increased as the week went on, some interesting cases of blessing being witnessed each night. One was a R.H.A. man recently returned from the war. He came round the next morning to ask Mr. Fletcher to write to his mother to inform her of the glad tidings of his decision for Christ. Other cases include some fine young fellows from neighbouring business houses. On Friday night the room presented an animated appearance, being filled with members of both sexes, and vividly recalled the old revival scenes which brought joy to so many hearts and homes. Some left the meeting, which continued till 10 p.m., confessing Christ as their newly-found Saviour. One interesting fact was the presence of representatives of three generations on the platform, namely, the missioner for the week, Mr. P. Russell Hurditch; his father, Mr. C. Russell Hurditch; and the grandfather of the missioner, Mr. William Holmes, who had also been connected with Stafford Rooms, having acted as secretary pro tem. after Mr. Hull's death.

You recently announced in The Christian Mr. Burnham's coming visit to Barkway (near Royston, Cambs.). We have had a gracious time. It is many years since there was as much interest in Divine things awakened in Barkway. Josiah Wilson.

Mr. J. Hawkins, of Wandsworth, has re-visited Lowestoft, conducting a twelve days' mission in the Railway Mission Hall. There were many inquirers, including two Scottish fishermen, and some railway men.—Mr. W. Day is holding services in Winnall Mission Hall (late Brewery), Winchester. Mr. Day writes: "On the spot where barrels of ale used to stand a number of us gathered round the table of the Lord. It was a joy to hear the once slaves to drink singing the songs of Zion."—Mr. J. Weston, who has held his fourth mission at Kelsall, Chester, writes to the effect that a time of blessing was experienced.—Mr. E. Hurditch has visited Presteign. Night after night people came long distances to the meeting. Anxious inquirers were pointed to the Saviour. The mission was the means of much spiritual good.

The Churches.

* The Editor will be glad to receive "post-card" notes for this page, of SPIRITUAL PROGRESS AND EFFORT in the Churches. They must be prompt, reliable, and NOT TRIVIALITIES; and be accompanied by sender's name and address.

Church of England.

Rev. E. M. Marsden, association secretary of the Church Pastoral Aid Society for the Eastern Counties, has been appointed to the vicarage of St. Paul's, Penzance.

The Dean and Chapter of Westminster have appointed Canon Wilberforce to the office of Archdeacon of Westminster, vacant by the death of the Venerable C. W. Furse.

The vicarage of St. Augustine's, Highbury, vacated by the promotion of Canon McCormick to St. James's, Piccadilly, has been offered by the patron to Rev. Robert Catterall, rector of St. Mary's, Crumpsall, Manchester, and accepted by him.

Rev. H. L. C. de Candole has issued his first annual report in connection with St. Paul's, Canonbury. A systematic house-to-house visitation of the whole parish has been commenced. A good deal of vigorous mission effort has been set on foot. Classes for factory girls and services for men are among the efforts that have been initiated and are sustained.

An itinerant Mission has been held in the Rural Deanery of Wenlock. Rev. S. Hooke, rector of Clopton (Suffolk), was invited by the Bishop of Hereford for the work. The mission commenced at Madeley. The congregations increased night after night—so much so that on the Sunday the church was packed, there being over 1,100 persons present. At Ironbridge and Coalbrookdale there were also large attendances, and many were spiritually impressed.

Congregational.

Rev. R. J. Campbell, of Brighton, continues to improve in health, and has been able to deliver a short address at the "At Home" of his congregation. Mr. Campbell is permitted by his doctor to preach once this month.

Services in connection with the settlement of Mr. E. T. Kirby, late of New College, have been held at Hawkeshead Street Chapel, Southport. Rev. E. Griffith Jones, a former pastor of Mr. Kirby's, spoke on "Congregational Principles," and a number of local ministers took part.

Calls (accepted).—Rev. W. P. Duke, of Ilminster, to Sanford Church, Crediton. Rev. W. Newton, of Oldham, to Cleator Moor.

Baptist.

After nearly twelve years' labour in Bow Common, Pastor T. J. Hazzard has resigned the pastorate of the Lighthouse Church, having accepted a call to the church at Northcote Road, Wandsworth Common.

Rev. J. Doubleday, of Sittingbourne, who has suffered from a serious breakdown in health, has so far recovered as to take up part of his ministerial duties. A hearty welcome was accorded to Mr. Doubleday on his return. He has held the pastorate for nearly twenty years.

The half yearly meetings of the Monmouthshire Association of English Baptist Churches have been held at Alma Street Baptist Church, Newport, Mon. Rev. A. T. Jones, Newport, presided. At a public meeting the mayor, Mr. G. Greenland spoke on the relations of the churches to temperance, commercialism and war.

The work at Wendover continues to go forward. The congregations are increasing. At Scrubwood a mission building has been secured after a long time of waiting. The pastor, Rev. W. Henry Collins, assisted by Mrs. Collins, has finished an eight-days' mission at Chesham, and begins a mission for the second time at Amersham.

Services have been held at Finchley Tabernacle, London, N., to celebrate the recent formation of the new church. In the afternoon Pastor Charles Spurgeon preached, and in the evening a public meeting was held. Rev. J. Chadwick, of Seven Kings, Ilford, presided, and the student pastor (Mr. B. J. Wicks) briefly reviewed the history of the work.

Rev. T. Chapman, minister of the Troyville Church, Johannesburg, writes to the effect that his church building has been very badly used during his enforced absence. Both the building, seats, books, and organ have been greatly damaged. He is anxious to restart his work, but this is impossible until the premises are restored. His people have all been scattered. Mr. Chapman toiled devotedly on behalf of our soldiers, and in the hospitals at Ladysmith. Rev. Ralph Holme, The Manse, Walsworth Road, Hitchin, Herts., will supply particulars.

Methodist.

The new forward movement of the Liverpool Wesleyan Mission was inaugurated on Sunday week. Hengler's Cirque has been engaged for these Sunday evening services, and is admirably adapted for the purpose. The sight on entering the vast building was an inspiring one. Under a blaze of electric lights, the area was crowded with a great company of people. The preacher was Rev. H. Howard May. With touching tenderness he presented the Gospel of deliverance to the weary and sinful. The service must have filled the workers with hope.

The present President of the Methodist New Connexion, while making pastoral visits in Barrow, happened to get into a house where he found washing being carried on by two women. Some men were lounging about smoking their pipes. The President got into conversation and invited the men to go to chapel. At length they made an offer; if the minister would do ten minutes' work at the "dolly-tub" they would all go and hear him preach. He accepted the challenge, took off his coat, and worked for the specified time. Next Sunday the men were seated well in the front of the chapel, they came again, and in the end two became converted.

Presbyterian.

Rev. J. B. Meharry has returned from Australia, and has been heartily welcomed on resuming his ministry at Crouch Hill.

St. George's congregation, Newcastle, have resolved to sell their church, with a view to their settling in a more suitable part of the city. This change has long seemed inevitable, as the present church is far from being well situated.

Rev. A. Connell has resumed his monthly "At Homes" to young men at the close of the evening service in the hall attached to Regent Square Church. Rev. Johnston Ross, of Westbourne Grove, has been selected as missioner at Regent Square Church, in connection with the forthcoming Simultaneous Mission.

At evening service at the Presbyterian Church, West Kirby, on Sunday week, a short address was delivered by Dr. J. A. Smith, who is about to proceed to India as a medical missionary at Rampore Boalia. At the request of the pastor, Rev. P. M. Kirkland, about 250 of the congregation remained at the close of the ordinary service for special prayer on behalf of Presbyterian missions in China and India, and a solemn season was experienced by those who had the privilege of attending.

Society of Friends.

Catharine J. Patching has completed her visit to Friends in Scotland. After leaving Aberdeen, the meetings at Glasgow, Ardrossan, Crosshill, Maybole, and Kilmarnock were attended. Many visits have been paid to Friends in their families, and to some residing where no meeting is held.

From first day, October 21 to 28 inclusive, a Gospel mission has been held at Great Wilson Street, Leeds, conducted by Howard Nicholson, with the assistance of Isaac Mason, recently returned from China. Each first-day morning Howard Nicholson gave a helpful address to the adult scholars, and Isaac Mason addressed the children. Many outward manifestations of the Divine presence were given.

Fallen Asleep.

SARAH ANN NAISH, a minister of the Society of Friends, in her fifty-fourth year.—Aged eighty-one, Miss MURRAY, of Beechwood, Selkirk, a friend of the late Duchess of Kent, and a playmate of Her Majesty in their childhood. She was a liberal supporter of many benevolent institutions.—Mr. W. P. SINCLAIR, for many years an elder in Mount Pleasant Presbyterian Church, Liverpool. Mr. Sinclair was a generous supporter of denominational schemes.—By the death of Rev. JAMES GRIFFIN, D.D., in the eighty-seventh year of his age, the Irish Wesleyan Conference loses one of its oldest and most highly esteemed ministers.—At Netley, Miss M. J. H. BRUNKER. This esteemed lady will be missed by many of the poor, both in the East End of London and in Ireland. Miss Brunker was an interested reader and distributor of THE CHRISTIAN from its earliest days.

A popular 11 o'clock lunch, especially in cold weather, is "a cup of hot Bovril." It not only warms and stimulates, but also nourishes, sustains and invigorates the system, fortifying it against the attacks of disease and the inclemencies of the weather.

To the outdoor man, battling with the elements, it is peculiarly acceptable; to the indoor worker it is a no less beneficial vitaliser and nourisher; to the home-keeper, tired with the care and responsibilities of house duties, it is a comforting and refreshing sustainer.

About Books.

CHRISTMAS CARDS AND CALENDARS.

The Religious Book Society, 28, Paternoster Row, has issued some choice motto cards for 1901. They are in various sizes with choice floral designs, and bear suitable watchwords. They are furnished with a cord for hanging, and will serve well for localization in connection with churches and societies.

THE calendars and cards issued by Hills & Co., 2, Bayer Street, Golden Lane, E.C., are varied in character. Some are patriotic; others are distinctively Scotch and Irish. There are also greetings for friends, and cards for children. The booklet calendars, with space for daily memoranda, are in some cases very pretty. Among the calendars in photogravure are "The Berkeley," with six landscapes (2s.); and "The Rossetti," with six pictures by the artist named and Albert Moore (2s. 6d.).

"Twelve hundred new sets of cards, embodying some 3,000 individual designs, ranging over upwards of 100 separate and distinct styles," is a large order, but not beyond the enterprise of Messrs. Raphael Tuck & Sons to discharge. Truly the art of Christmas card production is becoming a science, and for variety and elegance the achievements of this renowned firm stand well ahead of any whose samples for the present season have been submitted to us. It is an embarras de richesse. Besides cards, there are children's toy books, calendars, and booklets galore, treating of floral, animal, and, needless to add, military subjects, covering a wide range of price and gratifying of every conceivable taste. First, get a catalogue; then get the cards.

Year by year we are glad to bespeak a Christian interest in the Mildmay illuminations—in the form of calendars and seasonable cards. The issues for 1901 are singularly attractive, expressing sound Christian sentiment in artistic style. Among the calendars are: "Following On," a twelve-sheet floral production, the Scripture texts being selected chiefly from the words of our Lord (2s.); "Flowers from the Holy Land," a six-sheet turnover calendar, with sketches of Palestine flowers (1s.); "Mildmay Stand Calendar," for the writing table (1s.); "Upward and Onward," a six-sheet calendar, with views from the Suffolk coast (6d.). Others are "Pansy" and "Our Little Ones" (6d. each). The cards include Christmas and New Year varieties, and others for birthday and general greetings. Among the most interesting are: "Counsels of Peace," six folded cards, with sunk mounts and gilt edges (2s.); "Summer Flowers," folded cards with gold-line borders (eight in packet, 2s.); "Quiet Havens," sketches from the most picturesque neighbourhoods of Walberswick and Dunwich (six in packet, 1s.); "Springs of Life," studies of flowers, vine, and hops (six for 1s.). The mottoes for 1901 and intaglio cards are varied, and sure to meet with good demand. (From E. St. B. Holland, Mildmay-Deaconess House, London, N.)

Words to the Winners of Souls is a very useful booklet—instructive as well as encouraging to noble endeavour. (2d. Drummond's Tract Depôt.)

The Free Church Magazine is an admirable penny periodical for localization by Evangelical Free Churches. An advance copy of the issue for next January gives promise of enlarged usefulness. (Particulars from Arthur H. Stockwell, 17, Paternoster Row, E.C.)

The Missionary Calendar for 1901, compiled by Clara Benham, has underneath each date an item of news, a pointed appeal, or an apt quotation referring to foreign missions. Rev. F. B. Meyer says it is "an admirable idea, admirably executed. The price, 9d., is very moderate." (E. Kaufmann.)

Among recent issues is The Contented Parson, which forms No. 4 of the series "Stirring Tales from Welsh Life," by Mr. T. M. Wintle, of Pontymoile. The series include—"Tom Jones, the Baller;" "Kate; or, A Mother's Love;" and "The Stolen Ring; or, Given in Charge." These publications embody records of patient and devoted labour among the masses in the Principality, and have suitable and numerous illustrations. (1d. each. Morgan & Scott.)

Mrs. A. R. Simpson has given us another beautiful booklet—These Three. (1s. Oliphant, Anderson, & Ferrier.) Needless to say, its text is 1 Cor. xiii. 13, and that a helpful measure of light is thrown upon the marvellous words, both from Scripture use and literary illustration. To say the pages are readable is but to begin the scale of excellencies; they are spiritual in tone and bright with a heavenly light. It is a pleasure to call attention to a booklet which is so admirably designed to minister comfort to Christian people.

Notes & Comments

APATHETIC interest attaches to the In Memoriam number of "China's Millions" (1d. Morgan and Scott). It was fitting that the China Inland Mission should prepare a permanent record of those workers who so cheerfully laid down their lives for the sake of the Gospel. Sad, however, as the record is, it is full of spiritual fragrance. The work of compilation has been lovingly done, and some of the lessons which may be drawn from the devotion of these slaughtered saints are impressively set forth by Mr. Walter B. Sloan.

Whilst Europe has been absorbed in South African and Chinese matters, the Sultan of Turkey has taken the opportunity of recommencing his animosities against the hapless Armenians. Reuter's agent, under date of November 8, writes from Constantinople, giving a terrible account of the recrudescence of persecution and oppression. If one-half of this correspondent's statements are true, the Armenians in certain provinces are being treated more like animals than human beings.

The account reads like the story of Israel's oppression in Egypt over again. Armenian workmen have been forced to construct Government buildings without payment, and, what seems almost incredible, in several cases they have been compelled to supply, at their own cost, the wood necessary for the work. A telegraph office and a mosque have been built by the same method. It seems to be a reign of terror once more. Particularly hateful is the forced "conversion" of Armenian girls to Mohammedanism, many of these being compelled to enter Turkish harems. Massacre, apparently, has not yet been recommenced, but the poor people are condemned to what is almost worse than death. We know by this time who is responsible for all this misrule. Europe had her opportunity four years ago to end this miserable state of affairs, but she deliberately ignored it, and now things are becoming worse than ever.

A French pasteur remitting £10 to Rev. Dennis Osborne's Famine Fund a few weeks ago, asked: "Could we induce England to a great work of canalization, from the Himalaya to Bengal? A Christian nation cannot be satisfied by merely having a better government than Tippo Sahib or the Great Mogul. Christianity ought to put a stop to the recurrent famines of India." Yes; continual effort should be made to induce our Government to supply this crying need, not only from Himalaya to Bengal, but throughout India. But with such continual effort, continual believing prayer should be made to God, who is able to turn our captivity as the streams in the south.

The old order changeth, giving place to new,
And God fulfils Himself in many ways,
Lest one good custom should corrupt the world.
. . . More things are wrought by prayer
Than this world dreams of. Wherefore let thy voice
Rise like a fount [for India] night and day.
For what are men better than sheep or goats,
That nourish a dull life within the brain,
If, knowing God, they lift not hands of prayer,
Both for themselves and those who call them friend?
For so the whole round world is every day
Bound by gold chains about the feet of God.

The conduct of the Chinese converts during the recent persecutions has been on the whole so splendid, that we shall hear less in future from irresponsible travellers about "rice Christians" and such caricatures. Even the secular press is beginning to turn round from the attitude of cynical contempt for missionaries and their work and acknowledging its value. The Athenæum, in reviewing a book on the people of China, in which the usual shallow views are aired on this subject, said:—

From such views we have always dissented, and the recent outbreak has shown that the great bulk, at all events, of the converts are prepared to go through fire and water in defence of their adopted faith. As to the progress which Christianity has of late made in China, there can be no more authoritative witness than the Viceroy Chang Chih Tung, who recently stated that, as compared with Buddhism and Taouism, Christianity is now in the ascendant. It is always easy to find fault with such a complex system as is involved in the missionary effort, but events are proving with more and more certainty every day that Christianity is making sure, if slow, progress in the country, and that the influence of the missionaries resident in the interior is a power for good.

This is a sober and weighty judgment, which gains force from the judicial attitude evidently adopted by the writer.

The great union between the Scottish Churches, which we chronicled at length a fortnight ago, has served as a text from which many have once more preached the necessity of Christian reunion. While it is not likely, nor even desirable, that the dream of complete corporate reunion will be realized, it is very desirable that wherever division can be healed, steps should be taken to heal it. It is a spectacle which brings neither glory to God nor credit to the Churches, that of half a dozen bodies of Christians in a small town, each struggling for an existence, when they ought to be united and concentrating their powers upon the forces of evil. In several cases of this kind it is simple stubbornness on the part of a very few old people that prevents reunion. If these Churches, whose original divisions were caused largely by misunderstanding, would face the question of what is best for the Kingdom of God rather than what will please each community, the road to reunion would be opened at once. Whatever the future may reserve in the way of corporate reunion, local reunion ought to be practicable wherever present divisions are mischievous.

Real union, however, involves much more than external federation. We are entirely at issue with a Scotch divine who uses the recent union as a pretext for advocating a sort of Universal Ecclesiastical Noah's Ark in which persons holding any sort of Theistic belief may be received. Union of this kind would be a mere rope of sand. Elegant platitudes about the Fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man are not sufficient to form a cohesive bond between men and women such as that which Christ supplies in his Church. The basis of true Christian union is spiritual life—that life is in Jesus Christ alone, and whoever would possess it must accept as a fundamental truth the Deity of our Lord with all that it involves. There can never be, in the nature of the case, any true Christian union unless the bond of Divine Life attaches men to each other.

At the Conference on College training, held during the recent Jubilee of New College, some valuable suggestions were thrown out, of which two deserve special mention. The first was that a chair of Pastoral Theology should be separately appointed, part of whose business it should be to deal with the facts and problems of the spiritual life from a definitely Christian standpoint. At present, psychology is mainly dealt with in its abstract philosophical aspect, as required in university examinations—a very valuable study, but needing careful supplementation from a higher point of view, and with definite reference to the ministry. The second was that all students should have some practical training in pastoral visitation, under the guidance of a minister in active service, with a view to give them practice in dealing with individuals, and so equipping them more fully for the time when they enter on their own sphere of labour.

The forthcoming School Board election will be momentous in more senses than one, and it is to be hoped that the indifference shown by the public towards the recent Borough Council elections will not be repeated next week. The religious question settled the last contests in 1894 and 1897, the electors being determined that the sacerdotal party should not tamper with the School Board system in the interests of their special hobby of "denominational teaching in elementary schools." This party is always alert and ready to take advantage of any temporary lull in the public mind and conscience. Just now there is reason to believe that they are hoping to snatch a victory at the polls. Such a contingency would be a calamity to London, and a reopening of a sore question which has happily not had any practical disturbing effect on the school curriculum during the last six years.

A census was taken in the town of Wigan with a view of ascertaining the comparative attendances at the various churches on the one side, and at the various public-houses on the other, brings to light some startling results. It is sufficiently disquieting to hear that on a recent Saturday evening, between 7.30 and 8.30 o'clock, 25,021 persons visited the 315 public-houses in the district; but on the following night, between the same hours, 12,910 were counted as entering them, while at the sixty-six churches within the same area only 10,554 were present, of whom only 3,228 were men. If this is representative of the state of things in other towns, and in the great cities, we are surely in a perilous condition as a nation, and a fresh temperance campaign on a larger scale than ever is an imperative necessity.

The English people are proverbially slow in the work of reform; we have to wait some times for years before even the initial stages towards removing abuses are undertaken. We welcome at last the Money Lending Act, which came into operation upon November 1. Every money lender is now compelled to register under a penalty of £100. By the provisions of this Act, monsters like Isaac Gordon will become impossible, and persons who are compelled to resort to money lenders will have some degree of protection afforded them.

Another Bill we are anxiously awaiting is that which the late Lord Chief Justice promoted, and which will strike directly at the bare-faced blackmailing practised so generally under the high-sounding name of "commissions." At present the alternative for many men is—dishonesty or dismissal. We must not rest until commercial life is freed from the corruptions which menace the morals of men.

The decision of the Court for the Consideration of Crown Cases Reserved in the case of Ada Jane Stoddart, manager of Sporting Luck, convicting her of keeping a betting-house, disposes of one popular channel of gambling. The method pursued was to distribute sums of money as prizes among the readers of the paper who guessed successfully at the names of certain winners in horse-races. There was a technical difficulty in the case which was summarily and finally disposed of by the five judges forming the Court. It is a great public benefit that a practice has been stopped which has been spreading fast recently, creating a spirit of unhealthy and demoralizing excitement among thousands of young and unformed minds, and awakening the gambling mania in many who, possibly, would otherwise not think of it. The sums given away were often very large, but the amounts made out of the transaction by the defendant were larger still. This decision should put a healthy check on other questionable practices which lead to betting, pure and simple.

The latest device of certain professional "bookmakers," is to send out through the post, in envelopes marked "private," a daintily printed card inviting young men to bet upon certain horses, and offering very easy terms. One of these cards has fallen into the hands of a correspondent, who is an esteemed Christian merchant. In his case, the purpose of this gambling gang has, of course, failed. But it is a serious thing for any house to be thus invaded surreptitiously by unscrupulous men who penetrate the sacredness of the home and seek to corrupt young manhood there. Professional gamblers and bookmakers are now so numerous, and constitute such a menace to society, that it is high time to amend the law which is now so lax.

No fewer than fourteen members of the Society of Friends have been returned to the new Parliament, and the number of Wesleyans and other Nonconformists has been so largely increased that we may reasonably hope that their influence will be powerfully felt in the direction of righteousness and peace. If only the professedly religious members of the Commons would sternly band themselves together in regard to the pressing social questions of the day, the Administration would no longer be able to ignore their action, and the result would be of the greatest benefit in our national life.

It appears from a recent report made by the Local Government Board, that the total number of paupers in England and Wales this year amounts approximately to one in every thirty-nine of the population, and after making all reasonable deductions from these startling figures, it is only too evident that the question of the condition of the lower sections of our labouring classes will call soon for grave consideration and for thoughtful legislation. Strange to say, with all the poverty that abounds in London, Middlesex stands proportionately lowest in the scale of pauperism. As elsewhere throughout the kingdom, the drink traffic is responsible for a large proportion of the poverty. The great question of pauperism will not be satisfactorily dealt with until we have righteous statesmen who will dare to trace the effects to their causes. When Jesus said, "The poor ye have with you always," He referred to the poverty of misfortune, and not to that mass of misery which is created day after day by the "vested interest" of drink.

When we turn to the glowing and soul-stirring pages of Foxe's Book of Martyrs, and read the account of the noble deaths of those who gave up their lives at Lewes, we cannot wonder at the intense feeling with which the November demonstrations at that ancient country town are carried out. The celebration of such events, as one of the speakers said, simply emphasizes the immense benefits of the Reformation and of our Protestant institutions, and "the wish to oppose the avowed object of Popery, which was to bend the will of an Imperial State." Hence, in view of the fact that illegal Roman Catholic processions, with all their paraphernalia, are now permitted to pass through our streets, it is not desirable that the other, and national, side of the shield should be kept out of sight.

The "advanced" Church papers last week were full of reports of services held in connection with All Saints' Day and All Souls' Day. At the notorious church of St. Alban's, Holborn, a Requiem Mass for the dead was sung, and a sermon preached upon the Communion of Saints. The various preachers in the High Churches seemed to take it for granted that intercourse between the living and the departed was possible. This fancy, once accepted as fact, entails the whole system of Requiems, &c., as practised by those who delight to call themselves "Catholics." It may therefore be appropriate at the present moment to recall the wise words of the late Principal Edwards, of Bala. They appear in his commentary on Hebrews xii. 1.

> It is true we are compassed about with a cloud of God's faithful witnesses. But they are a cloud. The word signifies not merely that they are a large multitude, but also that we cannot distinguish individuals in the immense gathering of those who have gone before. The Church has always cherished a hope that the saints of heaven are near us, perhaps seeing our efforts to follow their glorious example. Beyond this we dare not go. Personal communion is possible to the believer on earth with One only of the inhabitants of the spiritual world. That one is Jesus Christ. Even faith cannot discern the individual saints that comprise the cloud.

Is the Church of England a Protestant Church or a "Reformed Catholic" Church? There is no doubt as to the general opinion since the time of the Reformation. The nation has always regarded the "National Church" as Protestant. It is so called in the Act of Settlement by which the Queen holds the throne, and in the Coronation Oath. Jeremy Taylor always called it by that title. Though the name does not occur in the Articles, it is distinctly implied in the sixth, where the essential Protestant position is laid down—that the authority of the Bible is supreme, and is above that of Councils and Bishops, and is to be interpreted, not by tradition, but by its own language and connection.

In spite of this, High Anglicans are beginning strenuously to oppose the use of the term as applied to their Communion, and in so high-toned a work as that which has just appeared on "Church Problems: A View of Modern Anglicanism." Canon Hensley Henson repudiates it, calling the Church of England a "Reformed Catholic" and not a Protestant Church. History must be rewritten, and the course of religious revolution and development in England for three centuries reversed, before this strange theory can be upheld. It is against all the facts.

A Retrograde Step.

THE Corporation of the City of Cork have at length been so ill-advised as to pass a by-law on "street preaching" in the following terms:—"No person shall preach in any street, or within fifty yards of any house within the said borough, after having been requested by any constable, or by a resident in such street, or an inmate of such house, personally, or by his or her servant or messenger, to desist."

The history of this by-law has no little interest attaching to it. For a considerable time the Roman Catholic leaders in Cork have been most anxious to put a stop to the open-air preaching which has proceeded for some years in that place, and the city fathers accordingly invoked counsel's opinion as to the best method to be adopted. At first it was attempted to bring in a by-law wider in its scope than the one now adopted, and covering the attack on "street-preaching" by an associated onslaught on bands and street noises.

It was seen that this would rule out the disgraceful Sunday which unfortunately prevail in Irish city life, and moreover it was found impossible to muster the two-thirds of the Council required by Act of Parliament. After several futile attempts, the Council succeeded in passing, by a large majority, the by-law quoted above. When the vote was first called, however, only thirty-six members out of the required thirty-seven were present, and it was only by admitting the vote of a member who came in subsequently that the by-law was declared carried, a proceeding against which Sir John Scott and other members protested.

The bye-law now adopted has no force until it has been submitted to the Local Government Board, which may either confirm or disallow it, and the decision will probably be reached about the middle of December. The Board's course will, we trust, be influenced by the circumstances under which the vote was taken, as well as by the discussion which preceded it, and in the course of which emphasis was laid on the vagueness of the term "preach," on the involved in the adoption of the bye-law, and on the fact that no attempt was made to suppress real nuisances, such as the playing of Nationalist bands when passing places of worship, and the discordant noises of itinerant musicians. Opponents of the bye-law very logically condemned its intolerance by pointing to the way in which Roman Catholic outdoor gatherings are allowed in London, and a strong protest was made against coercive legislation directed against one class. There is already evidence that the action of the Corporation is condemned by a large number of the rate-payers of Cork, and by no means only by those who approve of the open-air work. Our readers will, we feel sure, remember this matter in their prayers, for not only in Cork, but throughout Ireland, open-air work will be restricted if the Cork by-law meets with Government approval.

The Simultaneous Mission.

INTERVIEW WITH Rev. F. B. MEYER.

DEEP interest is being evinced in the forthcoming Simultaneous Mission. A member of our staff recently interviewed Rev. F. B. Meyer, President of the London Free Church Council. The facts gleaned, favour most earnest anticipations regarding the great enterprise.

"You are specially engaged, I think, Mr. Meyer, upon the arrangements for the metropolis?"

"I have a general interest in the work in the country, and am myself acting as chief missioner in Leeds. I have also written two or three of the pamphlets which are to be used throughout the country; but I have been so fully occupied with the preparations required for the London mission that it has been impossible for me to give more than passing attention to the organization of missions throughout the country. By this I have been saved some of the anxieties which have accrued to those who have had to deal with provincial centres."

"How many centres are you having in London?"

"The metropolis is divided, for ordinary Free Church purposes, into fifty-six centres, and I think that every one of these will be taking part in the Mission; two or three which were a little hesitant have now come in. We are leaving each of these fifty-six districts to organize themselves, and in most cases the churches have selected some two or three buildings on which they will concentrate. For these we have supplied in most cases missioners from head-quarters. In addition to the meetings held by these specially-selected missioners, there will be a large number of subsidiary gatherings for such as railway men, cabmen, young men and young women, business men, and children. These will, in most cases, be addressed by ministers of the various centres."

"Have you had much difficulty in finding missioners?"

"It has not been an easy thing. It must be remembered that we have had to provide between 150 and 200 workers who should be prepared to take the lead in the Mission, as commanders-in-chief of the forces engaged. But we have been successful in securing their help, not only of the foremost evangelists of our country, but of a large number of Evangelical, godly ministers, who are placing their time and talents at our disposal, to the glory of God."

"May I ask what are the more public features of the Mission?"

"We have arranged for an all-day of prayer on Monday, January 21, in the Queen's Hall, Langham Place. The meeting will begin at eleven in the morning, and during each successive hour it will be conducted by some well-known minister. We have secured the services of Rev. John McNeill, who will speak twice at the Queen's Hall on the day mentioned, and will hold services during that preparatory week in the City Temple, the Great Assembly Hall, Shoreditch Tabernacle, the Metropolitan Tabernacle, and Westminster Chapel. The Mission itself will be introduced on January 28 by a sermon by Dr. Parker at noon, in the Guildhall, which has been kindly placed at our disposal. Throughout these two weeks also Mr. McNeill will hold meetings at noon in the City Temple for business men and others. Gipsy Smith has been allocated to the Metropolitan Tabernacle; and Mr. W. R. Lane will work in Paddington."

"Do you gather that the Mission is being earnestly anticipated?"

"During these months of preparation, as President of the Free Churches in London, I am visiting the various centres day by day. I preach at 4, have a reception at 5.30, and there is a public meeting in the evening. I must say that the results of my observations have surpassed all expectations. I have had capital audiences, but above all there is a spirit of expectancy and spiritual preparation abroad, which augurs the highest possible good. People are already inquiring in what way they may help in the Mission, and the churches are arranging prayer meetings and other gatherings for securing and equipping workers for the inquiry room."

"So there are grounds for encouragement and hopefulness?"

"Decidedly. I feel that this is one of the greatest movements that has ever visited London. Great as was the revival under Messrs. Moody and Sankey, that after all was limited to some eight or ten important centres of the metropolis. In this case, however, probably the same number of people will be gathered in smaller meetings within the churches. The churches also will be stirred up, and I cannot but Certainly the ministers and missioners must be affected, for they will be compelled to adopt a method of address—of expostulation and invitation—which may, I think, constitute quite a new note in the preaching of the Free Churches generally from the opening of the new century. We are the more anxious that the mission in London should be all that we can hope for, because of the influence that may go forth and be exerted throughout the country, where the meetings will be held about a fortnight later. A great victory for God in London will send its thrill into all the great cities and towns of the kingdom, and to the remotest villages even, for which missions are also being planned to be held in March. It is our fervent desire that Christians of every section of the Church of Christ should lay aside the attitude of reserve and criticism, and blend their prayers with ours, that a fire may be lighted of the old Evangelical sort, which shall send its glow and blessing throughout the kingdom, for the benefit of all the churches that are akin to us in Evangelical doctrine."

ANTICIPATE GREAT RESULTS,

Hints to Mission Workers—3.

By Rev. ALBERT SWIFT, Dulwich.*

FAITH.

IN Christ (1.) as a Sin-Bearer.—He has made an atonement for us. He died for us—in our stead. The convicted sinner realizes that he is under condemnation. His thought must now be directed to Him who "was wounded for our transgressions and bruised for our iniquities."

2. In Christ as a Risen Saviour—the Saviour from the power of sin.—He not only "died for our sins," but "He is risen" that we "may be raised up with Him." The sinner needs more than pardon. He is "dead in trespasses and sins," and needs life—to be "born again"—through faith in a risen Saviour, who is not only able to save, but also to keep.

3. In Christ as a Personal, Present Saviour.—Many a man will speak of Christ as the Saviour, who dares not say my Saviour. The sinner must now be led to a personal appropriation of Christ, and the salvation that is conditioned on "faith in his Name." God's time is NOW. How any one can read the Bible, and then think of God as needing to be urged or persuaded to forgive a sinner, or as postponing the act of pardon after the conditions have been fulfilled, passes comprehension. Nay, God is more anxious to forgive than any sinner is to be forgiven, and it is safe to say that directly human conditions are fulfilled, that moment God saves. Delay is always on our part; never on his.

The most common difficulty is a desire to "feel" before "believing." This is putting the cart before the horse. A man must "believe on the Lord Jesus Christ" in order to be saved. How then can he feel saved before he believes. No sick person sends for a doctor, and receiving his prescription, says, "When I feel better I will take that medicine." Nay, he takes the medicine and then expects to feel better. Faith is to take the medicine prescribed by the Good Physician for sin-sick souls. Urge the sinner to take the medicine, and feeling will follow in due course.

The worker will often hear such expressions as, "I am trying to believe," or "I wish I could believe." "Trying" and "wishing" will not accomplish anything. The penitent must be led to cease trying, and rest in what Christ has done; to cease wishing, and simply trust Christ with the whole heart.

Believing is a very simple matter after all. It is just taking God at his word, and accepting Christ with perfect confidence as a personal present Saviour.

Various other difficulties will be presented. The worker should aim to meet them all from the Word of God, "which is living and active and sharper than any two-edged sword." A number of such difficulties, together with appropriate passages with which to meet them, are given below.

A few general hints may be useful in conclusion:—

1. Do not try to comfort sinners or palliate their sin. Deal with them faithfully. They will find comfort when they find Christ.

2. Do not tell a sinner he is saved. That is not your business. When he is saved, he will not need you to tell him.

3. Do not ask a penitent "how he feels." Salvation is not by feeling, but by faith. To inquire about his feelings is to fix his attention upon himself; whereas, he needs to look away from self to Christ. Ask him "if he believes Jesus saves him?" or "if he is fully trusting in the Crucified One?"

4. Lift up Christ! He is the object of our faith. It is possible to talk so much of "believing" that the One in whom the sinner must believe is overlooked.

5. Lastly, remember new-born babes are not expected to look after themselves. Take a continued interest in them, and do everything possible to encourage and strengthen them until they shall have reached the stature of "men and women in Christ Jesus." Lead them into Church fellowship, and see that it is fellowship, in fact and not in name only.

Elisha, the Prophet of Vision.

V.—Empty Vessels (2 Kings iv. 1-7).

By Rev. F. S. WEBSTER, M.A.*

THERE are two lines of teaching in this story. The one historical, giving, as all true history may do, precious light on God's dealings with all men in Providence. The other typical, illustrating, as in a parable, God's dealings with his people in Grace. Along the first line we notice—

(1) God's servants are sometimes in sore straits. This woman was doubtless a godly woman. Her husband was one of the sons of the prophets. But her cup of trouble was full. Her husband had recently died, and the pain of bereavement was aggravated by financial distress. There were debts left unpaid, and, as all her resources were exhausted, the creditors were coming to sell her sons into slavery. Her case seemed hopeless and very hard. It is so sometimes, even with godly people. As a general rule, godliness leads to prosperity. "The blessing of the Lord it maketh rich." But unchequered prosperity is often fatal to godliness.

PERPETUAL SUNSHINE MAKES A SAHARA.

There must be thorns in the earthly nest, or we should never want to wing our flight above. If the pilgrim's hut were not rudely shaken sometimes by winter storms, he might cease to long for the city which hath foundations. Never think that the Lord is against you when you are brought into trouble, but say with renewed self-surrender, "Speak, Lord, for thy servant heareth."

(2) The Lord is nigh to those that are of a broken heart. The broken health or circumstances are meant to lead to a broken heart, and thus the Lord draws nigh. So when the creditor was expected, God's almoner came instead. It was a great change for Elisha. Hitherto his miracles had been of a somewhat public character. But now he is approached, not by crowned monarchs, but by a bankrupt widow. Yes, God hath respect unto the poor. His attention is not absorbed with the great in wealth, or influence, or intellectual strength. Elisha was at hand when needed by three kings. He is also at hand to succour a widow and her two sons.

(3) God always requires the obedience of faith. The prophet's question drew the fact that of all her former possessions one thing only remained, namely, "a pot of oil." The widow's obedience was tested in connection with this oil. It was only a small anointing pot, but it was to be used to fill as many vessels as she could gather together. The orders were most precise—"Go, borrow thee vessels abroad of all thy neighbours."

IT SEEMED A RIDICULOUS TEST

to fill an empty house with empty vessels. But the obedience of faith does require us sometimes to obey without understanding why, and to do that which to human wisdom seems unreasonable and absurd. The vessels had to be sought before the oil began to flow. And the measure of her obedience in this was the measure of the miraculous supply.

(4) God always honours the shut door. We must shut the world out if we would enter heaven. No curious, pushing crowd must witness the manifestation of Divine power. God's choicest blessings are given in secret. Sometimes it is well to close the eyes of sense, that the eyes of our faith may be opened. The prospect before that widow's eyes was bare indeed. But the living God was there. He had told her to fill the empty vessels from that little pot. And his blessing made the scanty portion more than enough. The most fruitful and blessed moments in a man's life are those when he has to face utter emptiness and the living God. Don't be surprised if God sends some emptiness into your life; it is that you may shut out the world and get alone with Him.

(5) God's blessing always leads to practical results. The oil was sold, the debts were paid, and provision left for the future. If you cannot turn your blessing into account so as to live soberly, righteously, and godly before men, the blessing is not of God. If your life does not adorn the doctrine you hold, you may be quite sure that you do not hold it properly. George Herbert asks,

> What wretchedness shall give him any room,
> Whose house is dirty while he adores his broom?

The proof of the blessing must be in conduct and character. Dormant grace is not real grace. A Christianity which is invisible is not worth having. We must show our faith by our works. We must use our oil to pay our debts.

This brings us to the typical teaching. How are Christians to pay their debts? "Owe no man anything but to love one another," wrote St. Paul, and his love for men was so intense that he said, "I am debtor both to the Greeks and to the Barbarians." Wonderful is the transmuting power of the love of Christ. What more hateful than the condition of a debtor? yet St. Paul glories in the Gospel because it makes him a debtor to all men.

It is when we realize that we are freely forgiven that we find out how deeply we are left in debt. Are we paying that debt of love day by day? Many Christians find themselves in sore straits, hampered and fettered, and quite unable to walk and to "please God." As this widow's two sons, whose willing labour should have been her ample support, found themselves consigned to the creditor, so some Christians are and will, and cannot serve with joy and liberty. This story shows how such may be freed:—

(a) Confess your helplessness. As long as her husband was living, the woman hoped to pay her way. The law is called our first husband in Rom. vii., and there is no liberty or fruitfulness in our lives until we become dead to the law, and married to Christ. The triumph of Rom. viii. is generally preceded by the miserable failure of Rom. vii. We must learn the utter insufficiency of the "I myself" life, before we can enter upon the glorious fulness of the life in Christ. Have you begun to acknowledge "we are not sufficient of ourselves to think anything as of ourselves"?

(b) Uncover your need. That array of empty vessels was likely to dismay the poor widow. It was necessary to the receipt of blessing. God wants your emptiness, not your fulness. Find out all the empty places in your character and life. Don't overlook any. God's salvation is full and all-round. Human moralists often counsel concentration upon the conquering of one particular fault, the cultivation of one particular virtue.

IT MAKES PATCHWORK OF CHARACTER;

it does not lead to the symmetry of the mind of Christ. You must attack your spiritual foe wherever you discover him, or else a fancied victory at one point will only mean a shameful surrender at another. So discover and uncover all your emptiness. Let it be your daily task during the morning watch and the evening meditation to seek out every deficiency in your character. And if a neighbour's hint helps you to find one, be grateful, and do not resent it.

(c) Unstop the fountain of supply. If you are a true Christian you have received the Holy Ghost. "God hath sent forth the Spirit of his Son into our hearts, crying, Abba, Father." Your desire to pay your debt is a proof that you are not altogether without grace. But what is the grace of God to you? Just an act of justification? Just an experience of conversion? God's grace is more than one act or one experience. We often sing—

> Thou of life the fountain art,
> Freely let me take of Thee;
> Spring Thou up within my heart,
> Rise to all eternity;

but the fountain must be unstopped. If it is shallow water in your soul, if there has been ebbing of the river of grace, it is your own fault. It is probably through neglect of the shut door. When Christ says, "My grace is sufficient for thee," it means simply this, that there is no end to the supply of strength and courage, and wisdom and patience, until you come to an end of your need. Wherever there is on our part the shut door and the obedience of Faith, the blessing is outpoured. Then, and not till then, the holy life, the paying of your debts to God and man, will begin.

Pentecostal Power:

Its Application.

By Rev. G. CAMPBELL MORGAN.

PENTECOSTAL power is the energy of a God-indwelt life. Upon the basis of the wondrous and finished work of Jesus Christ, God the Holy Spirit has come to indwell all those who glorify Christ by living faith in Him. Consequently, there can be no application of this wonderful power by any person, until God the Holy Spirit, by the miracle of the new birth, has become the indweller of the temple of the soul.

Wherever God indwells, not merely one apartment, but the whole temple, there must be of necessity an application of his power. It is not a question of having a power which may be used or not, according to individual caprice. If a man be indwelt wholly and utterly by the Holy Spirit of God, then not merely in set service, but in every department of his life, he is making a contribution to the building of the city of God, and the bringing in of eternal righteousness.

The power of Pentecost can be applied only to Divine purposes; and this application can be secured only by discovery of, and obedience to, the laws by which the Holy Spirit works. It would be useless to build a water-mill far up a bank. The mill must be built on the edge of the stream, the wheel thrust down into the water; and, as the law is thus obeyed, the force accomplishes its purpose. If I possess Pentecostal power, and would apply it to the purposes of God, I must discover the law of the Spirit's operation, and must be where He can work through me.

THERE ARE THREE PURPOSES

for which the Holy Spirit came on the day of Pentecost. Jesus is to be Lord, the saints are to enter into sacred communion, and thus God's work is to be carried on in the world. It is only within that threefold sphere that I am able to apply the power of Pentecost. I cannot have that power to make me known as a preacher; nor can any persons have it to make them known as successful winners of souls. These things need to be said. I say them with reluctance, and yet with terrible conviction. The business of first importance is not that we should do anything, or be anything, except that we should be where God would have us be, and do what He would have us do, falling into the wonderful rhythm and movement of the Divine will, and entering into constant realization of fellowship with God.

In the first Pentecostal sermon preached by Peter, he traced the work of Christ, his perfect human life, his death upon the Cross in its two aspects—the aspect of human sin and the aspect of Divine arrangement, his triumphant resurrection, and his glorious ascension. God gave Him the Holy Ghost, and He, says Peter, "hath poured forth this, which ye now see and hear."

The Apostle further says, "Let all the house of Israel therefore know assuredly that God hath made Him both Lord and Christ. By the coming of the Holy Spirit there was established—first in the individual, and then in concentric circles around him—the Lordship of Christ.

I cannot apply the power of the Spirit to make Jesus Lord anywhere outside myself until that work is done in me. Jesus should be Lord in my life. Then follow the larger circles—the family, the church, the city, the nation, the world, and the sweeping circle of eternity. You may apply this gracious power, provided and possessed, to make Jesus Lord; but in order that this may be done, there must be placed upon the brow of the Master the diadem of the whole individual life—spirit, soul, and body. It is by the Holy Spirit that we realize

THE COMMUNION OF SAINTS.

Peter says in his epistle, "Ye are an elect race, a royal priesthood, a holy nation, a people for possession." I take only one item in that fourfold description of the Church, namely, "a holy nation." That word nation means a company of people living together under a common government, and having mutual inter-relation.

Here is the social idea of the Church in its brotherhood and oneness of life, by which if you are in sorrow I must weep, and if you are rejoicing I must be glad. The realization of that sacred communion of saints will make it impossible for there to be a lonely sufferer within the pale of the Catholic Church. Every message of love and service that you render is the application of the power of Pentecost.

The Holy Spirit is here for the carrying out of the enterprises of God, in the redemption of man, the destruction of evil, and promotion of the Divine glory.

The first enterprise of God is the redemption of man, and this does not merely consist in saving a man's soul. Surely you would not undervalue that? No, because I know perfectly well that, when a man's spirit is redeemed, the whole man is affected. If you seek to apply the power of Pentecost to-day; if by life, word, or prayer, you win a soul for righteousness and love, you help to plant another gem in the Redeemer's diadem.

Destruction of evil is another Divine enterprise. Wherever there is a vested interest, in this land or in any other, that is destroying human lives, and making it impossible for man to live the life of righteousness and love, there is a citadel that we have to take in the name of God and of humanity. We have not done all Pentecostal work when we have led individual men into relationship with Jesus Christ. There is a larger message which claims that every tyranny and oppression must cease, because God loves men and wills that all of them should be saved.

Out of that grows the third enterprise—realization of the glory of God. We rejoice in hope thereof; for that glory will only be perfectly consummated when all the power of the Cross of Christ has had its final and perfect outworking.

LAWS OF APPLICATION.

What are the laws under which we apply this power of Pentecost? The first work of the Holy Spirit is to bring into actual experience the Lordship of Christ. What, then, is our work? To trust and obey. How are we to apply the power of Pentecost to the communion of saints? He will suggest. What is our responsibility? To live and to serve. How are we to apply the power of the Spirit to the carrying out of the enterprises of God? He will direct. It is ours to abandon ourselves absolutely to Him, and then to act in the power of that complete abandonment. Jesus becomes Lord by the revealing of the Spirit. All that we know of the Master is known by the revealing of the Holy Spirit; and the process of that revelation is a perpetual and progressive one. The Spirit reveals the Master to us line upon line, and then waits for us to respond to the new revelation. If we obey it, that obedience creates enlarged capacity for receiving revelation; and to that enlarged capacity the Holy Spirit makes a yet larger revelation. We can never exhaust the riches that lie within the person of the Christ. Yet there are persons who still sing:

"Where is the blessedness I knew,
When first I saw the Lord?"

Where is the blessedness? Just where you left it; God never withdrew it. If there is loyalty to Christ, and obedience to the revelation which the Holy Spirit gives, then we go on from grace to grace, from glory to glory, until the moment comes when we shall see Him as He is, and be like Him. Then shall we truly begin to know and to serve Him; teaching to ages yet unborn and to unfallen intelligences the infinite grace and wisdom of God.

Thank God the Holy Spirit is provided. Is He possessed? If you are a Christian, He dwells within you; and you are never a Christian until He is your possession. You become a Christian by the incoming of God to your soul; that is the basis upon which all appeals should be urged in these days. You are a temple of the Holy Spirit; do not desecrate the temple, and do not keep part of it locked away from the blessed Inhabitant.

LET HIM COME INTO YOUR LIFE

until it shall be lived, not in a low, mechanical, and material way, but as part of the Divine power that moves towards the glorious consummation.

What does our world wait for to-day? What is it that God supremely desires? Men and women in whom He has his way; men and women who live for one thing—that God's will may be done in and through them; men and women, born of the Spirit, who fling the whole life open to Him, and say, "Blessed Spirit of God, we are careless as to what happens, if only Thou wilt get Thy way in us and work through us." Oh, that God may obtain sole possession of us! Oh, that we may say to Him, "From this moment I will no longer shut the Holy Spirit out of anything in my business, in my home, in my character, in that deep inner hidden secret of my life into which my best friend has never penetrated. Flow in, Thou Spirit of God; I yield to Thee. For the glory of God, for the coming of his kingdom, for the application of this great power, for the redemption of men, take me, here and now."

Such action will mean China for some of you. China shall yet be opened up to the Gospel; God is moving through this awful baptism of blood and mystery. It will mean India for some of you. On the other hand, some will have to give up China or India, and stay at home. How many of us are prepared to yield? What it may mean we will not ask. One thing only we decide—that, possessing the power of Pentecost, we will yield unreservedly to the indwelling Spirit, in order that the power may be applied to the crowning of Christ, the communion of saints, and the consummation of the enterprises of God.

The Bigger Room.

A CLOSED and bolted door on the first floor of a small house in a busy town in the Midlands. Inside, the pastor of the B—— Street Church, a man nearing middle age, and bearing on his strong noble face visible traces of the stress of life's battle. Rev. James Chester was not a man who could "take things easily." He had a strongly sympathetic nature and a keen sensibility to emotion; and alas! in this world of ours the nerves are more frequently smitten to pain than to joy. The "Madam How" and "Lady Why," so skilfully idealized for children by Charles Kingsley, were frequent visitors in this man's study. "How doth God know?" "Why doth the wicked triumph?"—the old problem in modern setting, and it is only those who have faced the fierce onslaughts of spiritual warfare, in this and other forms, who can understand the full force of the Bible words about "the good fight" of faith.

On this particular morning Mr. Chester was the victim of combined influences—physical, atmospheric, and social—that make for depression. In the first place it was Monday, that day of terrible reaction to a true minister from the Sabbath exaltation and strain. There was a fog, too, blotting out the sunlight, and though he had bolted himself into his study from fear of interruption, he could not bar out domestic sounds of children's voices and household work, sounds so pleasant to a man of leisure when softened by the distances of an ample dwelling, but possessing a distinctly irritating tendency when borne in too closely on sensitive nerves.

But as the morning wore on prayer brought its own beneficent calm, and the renewed and strengthening consciousness of that Presence which is the

and as the chime of a neighbouring church told the hour of noon, he laid down his pen and wisely determined on a short stroll in the open air from which the fog was now clearing.

Just then there was a new sound, noisier than previous ones, but it brought a light into Mr. Chester's face, and an expression of pleased expectancy. A rush of heavily-shod little feet up the stairs, a vigorous pounding of impatient hands on the door, and then the eager tones, "Father, father, let me in; it's very 'portant!" The bolt was at once withdrawn, and little six-year-old Teddy Chester burst into the room and into his father's arms shouting, "Father, what do you fink? I've got into the bigger room!" And he extricated himself from the paternal embrace and indulged in a wild war dance as a safety valve for his ecstasy.

Mr. Chester understood all about "the bigger room." It meant a higher rung on the educational ladder for the wee laddie whom he loved so much—the infant class left behind, and the first stage in maturer life reached. And he remembered, what to Teddy was as waters that had passed away, all the discipline that had led up to this—tasks so hard for baby brains that they had been steeped in bitter tears; "detention" from coveted play; home lectures over reported carelessness, and sometimes even a very mild caning! And it was through this vestibule, with its dark corners, its apparently gratuitous and meaningless exactions, limitations, and impositions, that Teddy had come into the bigger room! Mr. Chester gave the boy one big, fatherly hug, left him to circulate the news in his own hilarious fashion, and went out for his walk.

He had preached to his people yesterday; to-day his child "had taken the text and preached patience" to him. He saw no longer "as in a glass darkly" the meaning of past experiences that were at the time so inexplicable, and, partly because of this, so exceedingly trying. The family tragedy that staggered all human calculation and baffled all human dealing, the disappointments that lurked even in earthly success, strained relations, perplexing circumstances—were they not all lessons in God's school that opened the door into the bigger room? In that morning's light he recognised that he was a better and wiser man for each one of them; and, as so many of his fellow-scholars have had reason to do, he "thanked God and took courage."

Mrs. Browning, in one of her beautiful poems, asks,

Is ever a lament begun,
Which, e'er it endeth, suits but one?

and may we not say the same of our spiritual confidences? There is a wonderful unity of experience in the family of God, and perhaps little Teddy's father may not be the only perplexed one to whom he may speak. We are all such children in our crude ideas of moral education, craving for results but deprecating the troublesome processes; and some of us never get beyond a feeling of surprise, and sometimes almost of resentment, when the chastening, which our Heavenly Father assures us is a special proof of his love, comes to check some cherished purpose, or to lay some earthly hope in ruins. And yet "this is the way the Master went." "Though He were a Son, yet learned He obedience by the things which He suffered." We are wiser in our judgments concerning earthly advantage; we know how to appreciate the great favour bestowed on a child, when the parents—often by keen self-denial—secure for it a splendid education. Shall we not enter a little more intelligently into our Father's purposes, and, instead of a grudging submission to his will, render gladly the Psalmist's ascription of praise: "I know O Lord that in faithfulness Thou hast afflicted me"? And so we shall be prepared for a yet higher note of triumph when in view of more developed powers we can gratefully say, "Thou hast set my feet in a large room!"

The Newton Abbot Convention, November 6-8, was, as usual, in boisterous weather, seeing that the two now generally held per year are about November and February, but there were good attendances and the deepest attention. Our dear brothers, Dr. White and Capt. Riley, both Army men this time, spoke the message of God's full and free salvation with much power in the Holy Ghost. On the last morning, as usual, praise and testimony was given, and it rejoiced all our hearts to hear of great blessing in the Baptist Church in the salvation of forty souls attributed to the last Convention, and numerous acknowledgments of help and blessing received during these days. There was also a desire and determination expressed to do more in going after the large unreached proportion of our population. May God lead and bless his people and have all the glory! H. G. C. B.

The Bible Society.

WITH the growth of education, and the development of missionary effort in all parts of the world, the Bible Society becomes increasingly useful as the chief storehouse and distributing centre of the Word of God. It is fit, therefore, that the claims of the Society should be more frequently pressed upon the attention of Christian people, and a step in this direction was happily taken in the arrangement of an autumn gathering, which was held on Thursday evening last at St. James's Hall.

After prayer, offered by Rev. John Sharp, Editorial Superintendent, the Marquis of Northampton, who presided, reminded his hearers that this was the first occasion on which he had spoken as president of the Society. After referring to the loss sustained by the death of Lord Harrowby, the speaker alluded to the distinguished services of another former president—the great Lord Shaftesbury. Proceeding, Lord Northampton said they could rejoice in the work of the past twelve months.

A RECORD CIRCULATION

of God's Word has been reached. No fewer than 5,000,000 copies of the Bible or Scripture portions have been distributed during the year, making a total circulation for the century of 165,000,000. In the great war which is waged against vice and sin, said the speaker, the weapons are provided from the arsenal at the Bible House. The outlook is hopeful. True, much has to be done; many millions have still to be reached, and the Word of God spread both among the heathen abroad, and in those homes in our own land which are still without the Bible. It is a slur upon our national character that there is so little Bible study among us. Lord Northampton next referred to the Chinese crisis, and the death of one of the Society's sub-agents, who was murdered under distressing circumstances, during the recent disturbances. The sacrifice of Christians will be followed, the speaker believed, by a general spread of Christianity. The Society will not be content until the open Book is spread throughout the whole world, in all languages. In some nations, we must remember, the Book has been closed, and the decadence of such nations may be traced to the fact that in them the Gospel is not open to the people. Dealing with the objection that teachers must go before the Bible, the speaker contended that the Word does not necessarily require any interpreter; the world needs the truth, and the Society, in distributing the truth, serves mankind. In that work it asks for prayerful sympathy and practical support.

The Archbishop of Canterbury, who followed, said he believed the Society to be one of the most valuable instruments provided by God for doing his own work. No great miracle has been wrought to bring the name of the Lord Jesus before common men; He has chosen that this should be done

THROUGH HUMAN AGENCY.

Although He died for our sins, the knowledge of that death is communicated by the action of mankind. He does not choose that He shall be active and we passive, but, loving us, He calls us, who are his servants, to be fellow-workers with Himself. It is in our hands to make the Gospel known. The Church has not yet fully realized its responsibility in the matter, but the responsibility is there. We are called to send forth men trained in the knowledge of his word to preach the Gospel and teach his will, and the Bible must be the text book of that teaching. It is possible to find every other book exhausted, but the more we read the Bible the more we realize that it is inexhaustible. It is the Bible itself that teaches us how to read the Bible. The more we read it, the more we are disciplined to understand it. We must not rest content until there is no language in which the Bible is not read. The world has suddenly become much smaller, in that the means of intercourse have been vastly increased; this is a summons to greater missionary effort, and, included in that summons, is the call for greater supplies of the Word of God.

Mr. Ira D. Sankey was warmly welcomed on rising to sing "The Story that Never Grows Old." Before giving this favourite solo, Mr. Sankey spoke briefly on the impetus given to Bible study by Mr. D. L. Moody. Wherever he had gone, in the course of his evangelistic labours, the sale of the Bible had increased, for his preaching caused people to

LOVE AND STUDY IT.

When passing the Bible House, Mr. Moody was wont to take off his hat, in token of reverence for the Bible and the Society.

Rev. Dr. Glover, of Bristol, was the next speaker. Advocating the Society's cause with characteristic earnestness and vigour, he pointed out that it is one of the strongest missionary organizations as regards its own army of workers, and it is also the handmaid of every other missionary society. Missionary work is not thoroughly done until the Bible is given to the convert. Proceeding, Dr. Glover dealt with the position in China, and traced the difficulties that have arisen to the politician and the trader, and not to the missionary. The Gospel has within it the message of mercy and love that will last when the present transient disturbance of thought has passed. What we read of to-day occurred also under Nero and Diocletian, but a purer life resulted. The Gospel may disturb, but it disturbs to bless. Dr. Glover went on to describe, in eloquent terms, some of the blessings that have accrued from the Gospel, and referred, in a pathetic passage, to the missionaries who have been massacred by the Boxers. The dead call upon us, saying: "You sent us and we died; what are you going to do?" Converts, too, have perished by the thousand, and is there not another call in this? The Chinese Christians have had their Calvary; they will

SURELY HAVE THEIR PENTECOST.

Dr. Glover appealed to his fellow Nonconformists to rally to the help of the Society.

After Mr. Sankey had sung "Saved by Grace," Rev. Chancellor Edmonds gave an address, full of interesting reminiscences. The speaker has long been intimately associated with the Society, and was able to recall the labours and distinguishing characteristics of former presidents. In particular, he referred to Lord Shaftesbury, whose great heart was moved by the spiritual destitution around him. He saw the hungry multitudes, and gave them the Gospel. His influence was used to the diffusion of the Word of God, and the more general acceptance of the rule of Christ. As to Lord Harrowby's period, it was marked by wonderful progress, which is still continued. Dealing with matters of criticism, the speaker said that there is nothing new in the contention, which has been urged of late, that it is unsafe to send the Bible without a man to teach it. The argument is a familiar one, but Church History shows that it is fallacious, and may not be made by any person having any claims to scholarship. While not limiting the usefulness of the teacher, it is clear, from the recorded experiences of seekers so far back as the second century after Christ, that men who tried various theories of religion, and proved them to be wanting, ultimately found the truth for themselves in the Bible. Proceeding, Chancellor Edmonds dwelt on the remarkable results of missionary effort in Uganda, and the keen demand for Bibles which has arisen in consequence. When, some twenty-three years since, the speaker was on the Society's staff, there was not one known Christian in Uganda; but now an issue of 25,000 copies of the Scriptures has been absorbed. This edition contained marginal references; the called for such assistance. A further order for 10,000 copies has been received, and it is anticipated that within the next two years 15,000 copies will be disposed of, and that, too, at a price equivalent to two shillings each.

A third solo from Mr. Sankey, the "Ninety and Nine," formed an appropriate conclusion to a very profitable gathering, which was marked by enthusiasm for aggressive work in disseminating the work of God among the lost.

Hungering for the Word.

SIR,—The following touching communication has reached me from the Paulicians of O'Besenyo:—

"With the greatest humility we approach you, asking you, in the name of the Lord, to comfort the company of believers at O'Besenyo, letting them know whether there be any hope of a translation of the New Testament into the Palityán tongue. We turn to you with longing desire and heart-breaking, and ask, and seek, and knock, entreating you to give us a comforting assurance.

"We see that other nations, who did not ask for it, have got the Word in their own tongue; we, on the other hand, ask, and there is no sign of anything as yet, but just a beginning." (The Gospel of John has been already issued.)

"We hear it said that the work begun cannot be finished. We shall be like man who began to build, not counting the cost, and could not finish."

I have written to those dear brethren that the translation work is being carried forward. I was much encouraged by a donation of £20 transmitted by Dr. Baedeker, who pleaded the cause of the people recently at the Evangelical Alliance Assembly in Liverpool. We have as yet, however, only received a small part of the whole sum required for translation and printing—about £230. Contributions may be sent to me, or to Dr. Baedeker, or to the National Bible Society of Scotland.—I am, yours very truly, Rudolf Quai, 8, Budapest. Andrew Moody.

Theatrical Employees.—Mr. William Forbes is visiting Hull for the purpose of conducting meetings among theatrical women. Social gatherings, at which evangelistic addresses were given, have been held in the Presbyterian and Congregational school rooms.

Veteran Colporteurs.—In connection with the Metropolitan Tabernacle Colportage Association, an effort is being made to raise a fund of £500, from which to assist colporteurs, who, by reason of age and infirmity, are compelled to cease work. Of this sum £235 has been received, and it hoped that the required amount may be completed this year. Communications may be addressed to Mr. S. Wigney, Pastors' College, Temple Street, Southwark, S.E.

The Spirit of God.*

THE last quarter of the dying century has been marked by a close, reverent, and loving study of the truth concerning the Holy Spirit.

The latest contribution to the subject is a treatise by Rev. G. Campbell Morgan, of which every chapter manifests a painstaking survey of all that Scripture has said upon it. The writer affirms truths which are not held—even the contrary of which are held—by many teachers, whose desire and aim, equally with his own, are to enforce the privilege, possibility, and responsibility of holy living.

Twenty years ago an article appeared in these columns entitled, "The Second Blessing, the Missing Half of the First." The argument before us travels on the same line. The writer draws attention to the fact that no such term as "Second Blessing" occurs in Scripture; and that believers are baptized with the Spirit immediately they believe, as in the typical case of Cornelius and those with him (Acts xi. 15-17). He adopts the formula given by Dr. Erdmann, of Philadelphia (who for years answered the questions of inquirers on Round Top at Northfield Convention) — "One baptism, many fillings."

The book is dedicated "to the fragrant memory of George H. C. Macgregor, M.A., ... in comradeship and communion with whom the idea of such a treatise was suggested." It may not follow, however, that the sainted comrade, "now among those who know in the light of the seven Spirits before the throne," would have endorsed all the interpretations given here, though agreeing with the main conclusions. For ourselves, while cordially and thankfully welcoming the book as a Scriptural and forceful correction of teachings which confuse between the free and unlimited gift of God and our limited acceptance of the gift, we cannot assent to some of the interpretations of Scripture by which the corrections and conclusions are enforced.

We do not think that the Church was created at Pentecost, though dispensationally it was then inaugurated; for the elders of Heb. xi. "saw the promises from afar and embraced them," and "faith is the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen." "They without us shall not be perfected," surely implies that they with us shall be perfected.

We do not think that the disciples previous to Pentecost, "were not yet born again" (p. 196). If "even in those old days before Christ there were souls who passed their days homed in God" (p. 78), surely such souls were born again; and, if so, surely the disciples also, who forsook all and followed Him, and continued with Him in his temptations.

These and other special views appear to result from a study of dispensational truth, without sufficient regard to the larger purpose which is beyond dispensations. We regard dispensations as scaffolding to be removed when the building is complete. They are not time, but hours which mark the time.

On the other hand, light is thrown on various passages, as on the power of the keys (p. 133), and the general conclusions are sound and helpful, and calculated to lead many sincere souls out of bondage into the liberty of the full and free Gospel of a completed work and of every spiritual blessing having been already given.

Because Jesus has been glorified, the Spirit has been outpoured. Until Jesus ceases to be glorified, the Spirit will not cease to be outpoured. "Some profess to be waiting until God is willing to fill them. . . . While they think they are waiting for God, the fact is God is waiting for them. At any moment, if they yield to the Spirit, He will sweep through every gate and avenue and into every corner of the life" (pp. 230, 231). We are not to pray for the outpouring of the Spirit, but to drink of the river of living water perpetually outpoured and flowing from the throne of God and of the Lamb, and so to be filled with the Spirit.

The Work of the Holy Spirit.

BOOKS on the Holy Spirit have been very numerous of late, but comparatively little has been written on his work as distinguished from his place in the Divine economy. We therefore give a cordial welcome to a volume of considerable importance by a well-known Dutch theologian:—The Work of the Holy Spirit. By Abraham Kuyper, D.D., LL.D., Professor of Systematic Theology in the University of Amsterdam. Translated from the Dutch, with Explanatory Notes by Rev. Henri de Vries (12s. Funk & Wagnalls Co., 44, Fleet Street). Professor B. B. Warfield, of Princeton Theological Seminary, U.S.A., contributes an introduction to this book of 700 large pages, written in untechnical language, but dealing with some of the sublimest subjects that ever occupied the human mind.

In the religious life and politics of the Netherlands, Dr. Kuyper is a power for good. This book comes after many others in which he has shown himself an unflinching champion of Evangelicalism. In fact, we have here three volumes in one, containing over a hundred chapter sections—clear in style, consistent in argument, and dealing with the principal facts of religion. In reality, these pages expound the essential doctrines of the Christian faith—so all-embracing is the sphere of the Spirit's operations, in creation and recreation, and in the endowment of men in manifold ways to serve God and execute his will. The point of view is Calvinistic, in the wide meaning of that term on the Continent, and the author is always interesting, while engaged in controversy no less than when developing profound teaching in the simplest terms. We make brief excerpts from chapters of great value:

JUSTIFICATION.

If it belongs to the very essence of sovereignty, that by the ruler's decision alone the status of his subjects is determined, then it must be clear, and it can not be otherwise than that this very authority belongs originally, absolutely, and supremely to our God. Whom He judges guilty is guilty, and must be treated as guilty; and whom He declares just is just, and must be treated as just. Before He entered Gethsemane, Jesus our King declared to his disciples: "Now are ye clean through the word which I have spoken unto you." And this is his declaration even now, and it shall for ever remain so. Our state, our place, our lot for eternity depends not upon what we are, nor upon what others see in us, nor upon what we imagine or presume ourselves to be, but only upon what God thinks of us, what He counts us to be, what He, the Almighty and Just Judge, declares us to be.

When He declares us just, when He thinks us just, when He counts us just, then we are by this very thing the children of Him who shall not lie, and ours is the inheritance of the just, although we lie in the midst of sin. And in like manner, when He pronounces us guilty in Adam, when in Adam He counts us subject to condemnation, then we are guilty, fallen, and condemned, even though we discover in our hearts nothing but sweet and childlike innocence.

In this way alone it must be understood and interpreted that the Lord Jesus was numbered with the transgressors, although He was holy; that He was made sin, although He was the living Righteousness; and that He was declared a curse in our place, although He was Immanuel. In the days of his flesh He was numbered with transgressors and sinners, He was put in their state, and He was treated accordingly; as such the burden of God's wrath came upon Him, and as such his Father forsook Him, and gave Him over to bitterest death. In the Resurrection alone was He restored to the status of the righteous, and thus was He raised again for our justification.

SANCTIFICATION.

Sanctification is God's work in us, whereby He imparts to our members a holy disposition, inwardly filling us with delight in his law and with repugnance to sin. But good works are acts of man, which spring from this holy disposition. Hence sanctification is the source of good works, the lamp that shall shine with their light, the capital of which they are the interest.

Allow us to repeat it: "Sanctification" is a work of God, "good works" are of men. "Sanctification" works internally; "good works" are external. "Sanctification" imparts something to man; "good works" take something out of him. "Sanctification" forces the root into the ground; to do "good works" forces the fruit out of the fruitful tree. To confound these two leads people astray. . . .

Both sanctification and good works shall receive recognition. Ministers of the Word, and through them the people of God, should understand that sanctification is an act of God which He performs in man; and that God has commanded man to do good works to the glory of his name. And this will have twofold effect: (1) God's people will acknowledge their complete inability to receive a holy disposition, otherwise than as a gift of free grace, and then they will earnestly pray for this grace. (2) They will pray that his elect, in whom this work is already wrought, may show it forth in God-glorifying works: "Chosen in Christ Jesus, that we should be holy and without blame before Him in love" (Eph. i. 4).

Though, as we have intimated, this book is untechnical in language, it is a theological treatise of conspicuous merit. The author stands by Holy Scripture, and even where we would not follow him in matters of interpretation, we admire his reverence, and are helped by his resource as an expositor and his power in the practical application of Scripture teachings.

The Love of God.*

By Mrs. A. R. SIMPSON.

"GOD is love, and he that dwelleth in love dwelleth in God, and God in him." Were these golden threads woven into the warp and woof of our daily life, with a new century would begin a new creation; all things would become new. The late winter sun will rise on us to find another day of his love, for He lives and lives to love. The Christmastide makes us love as we stand round his cradle—God's unspeakable gift to this world. The Eastertide keeps us near his grave, where He gave up "the love of life for the life of love." Paul prays that we may be able to comprehend with all saints, and to know what passeth knowledge. Here is a task for the New Year, the unravelling of a web of love, translating the language of the skies into our own colloquial. The greatness of God may have spoken to us at Niagara or beside Mont Blanc; but greatness only appals us. We have still to face the problem of the pain and suffering and misery around. How are we to reconcile these with love? We do not understand, because we are trying to reason out what cannot be reasoned, for there is a height, a depth, a breadth, a length, which no plummet can gauge. Where do we see at once the fullest manifestation, and

THE SOLUTION OF THE RIDDLE?

Let us go outside a city wall. It is spring; but Nature has veiled her face. A cross is set up, low enough for a voice of tenderness and love to be heard by those beneath: "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do." We close our ears to the world's clamour; we loose our shoes, for the spot is holy; we fall on our knees. "Can this be very God of very God, the Man Christ Jesus?" It is not so much the pain that moves us; another might have suffered. It is not so much the shame and spitting; another might have borne the disgrace. But it is because our sin nailed Him there; and as we look up, we whisper, "He loved me and gave Himself for me." Love has called in Faith, and Faith has triumphed. We turn to one another, and say, "He that spared not his own Son, but delivered Him up for us all, how shall He not with Him also freely give us all things?" But as we descend the Mount worn out with grief and weariness, we fall asleep. We see in a vision a man, our brother, left by the roadside, stripped, having fallen among thieves, bruised and bleeding, and we bind up his wounds, pouring in oil and wine. The vision fades, but we hear a voice, "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto Me." We wondered at the dream till we remembered we had been to Calvary. His love was for the time illumining our life, and we had begun to work it out according to the pattern shown us on that Mount.

Love understands the mystery, whereof
We can but spell a surface history:
Love knows, remember: let us trust in Love;
Love understands the mystery.

Episcopal Poets.

TWO of the most distinguished prelates of Ireland are among the poets. First we notice The Finding of the Book; and Other Poems, by William Alexander, D.D., Archbishop of Armagh, and Primate of of all Ireland. (6s. nett. Hodder & Stoughton.) Here we have old pieces in a revised form, and many new poems, making a substantial volume. The contents are classified—Imaginative and Reflective, Historical, Scriptural and Devotional, Oxford Poems, recently written, and Sonnets—chiefly in the author's library. There is variety of rhythm and measure, but from first to last profound thought and graceful expression go hand in hand. The title poem was suggested by reading Bacon's "New Atlantis." Unbelief, negative criticism, and false science are rebuked, and then:

Patience! God's House of Light shall yet be built,
In years unthought of, to some unknown song,
And from the fanes of Science shall her guilt
Pass like a cloud. How long, O Lord, how long?—
When Faith shall grow a man, and Thought a child,
And that in us which thinks with that which feels Shall everlastingly be reconciled,
And that which questioneth with that which kneels.

The historical poems, in several instances, recall incidents connected with Augustine, Bernard of Clairvaux, and other worthies. From the Devotional section, in which some quaint notions and unaccustomed interpretations are enshrined, we reproduce the last three stanzas of

THE PREACHER'S MEDITATION.

Give me words of Thine to utter that shall open the lock'd heart like keys—
Words that, like Thine own sweet teaching, shall be medicinal for disease,—
Words like a revolving lanthorn for the ships in darkness—give me these.
In the Sunday summer evening
two lights are there, in the church, unlike.
One the cool sweet dying sunshine;
one the gas-jet's fierce light-beaded spike.
With the first my speech be gifted—light to touch and tremble, not to strike.
So for all these thousand spirits, differing more than any faces do,
Christ through me may have some message that shall be at once both old and new,
And my sinful human brethren through my sinful lips learn something true.

Among the Oxford Poems is "The Waters of Babylon," which gained the prize in 1857-60.

The second volume before us is Poems, Chiefly Sacred. By Right Rev. George A. Chadwick, D.D., Bishop of Derry and Raphoe (5s. Hodder & Stoughton). This is a smaller volume, but rich in thought, and stimulating in tendency. We extract a short poem:—

THE LOVE OF LOVE.

The world is a bubble, and Death shall die:
Love shines longer than lights in the sky.
The moon is a cinder; the sun grows old:
Love's fire only shall never wax cold.
The stars burn out, but the lamp of Love
Illumines for ever the Blessèd above.
Love is the soul of the song they sing
Through the day that fears not an evening.
The song of their love shall for ever resound
In the ears of the Love whom their God hath crowned.
Crowned in heaven is the Love who came
For love of the loveless to sorrow and shame.
Deathless in heaven is the Love who died;
Adored, whom Caiaphas crucified.
Here by His love is His Church led forth
From the east and west, from the south and north,
Ever a pilgrim, through snow, through heat,
Through life, through death, till she kiss Love's feet—
Yea, my God, till her glad eyes see
Love, the Lord of Eternity!

After recognizing pardoning mercy, and asking that "earth-born anthems" may be forgiven by Him "whom the heavens adore," the poet writes:

O Jesus, countless worlds confess
Thy Majesty, Thine holiness:
We fade, we perish as a leaf,
Consumed by longing and by grief;
Ours is no strength but this, to cry
"Save us, O Saviour, or we die!"
O Sovereign Jesus, as the sun
Binds all the universe in one,
And stars and raindrops own the spell
Whereby they keep their courses well;
Nought is too great, too small for Thee—
Take then my heart, and govern me.

Among the most attractive contents of Dr. Chadwick's book, we would place the three Communion Hymns, and a Prayer beginning:

O Jesus, merciful and strong,
To whom our loftiest faith does wrong.

These two volumes witness to the erudition and culture of the Irish Episcopal Bench.

A Word for the Puritans.

IT is found, with much that is useful, in The Meeting of the Centuries; a Review and an Outlook of English Congregationalism. By J. Guinness Rogers. (1s. 6d. Partridge.) This is a little book of more than denominational interest. Intended to explain the aims and purposes of the Congregational Twentieth Century Fund, it surveys a wide field of Christian activity at home and abroad.

It is refreshing to read pages that are so sturdy in their defence of the Puritan spirit. Says Dr. Guinness Rogers:

There are some who fancy that the age needs a new faith—all its own—and who, with lightness of heart, would undertake to provide it. The demand is simply one of the many signs of the conceit of the age. It is not a new faith that is needed, but a more vital force in the old. The generation, we are told, needs a new presentation of Christianity. It may be so, but how is it to be given? Not in new intellectual speculations, or philosophical theories, but in new men, possessed, as those old Puritans were possessed, by a faith in God which quickened the conscience and governed the life. Their strength lay, not in their methods, not even in their stern law of life, least of all in their organizations, but in their personal godliness. Emphatically they are servants of God. In some respects our idea of that service may differ from theirs. But at least let our loyalty be as pure, our enthusiasm as fervid, our obedience as absolute.

These are words of wholesome truth. We trust the booklet will have many readers.

Arabia and Islam.

A BOOK of sterling worth, from the pen of a writer specially qualified for his task, is: Arabia: The Cradle of Islam: Studies in the Geography, People, and and Politics of the Peninsula, with an Account of Islam and Mission Work. By Rev. S. M. Zwemer, F.R.G.S. (7s. 6d. Oliphant, Anderson, & Ferrier.)

An American missionary, Mr. Zwemer has for some years been labouring among the Mohammedans in or near the Arabian Peninsula, and he dedicates his handsome volume to the Student Volunteers of America, in memory of Revs. Peter J. Zwemer and George E. Stone, two American volunteers who laid down their lives for Arabia.

Rev. James S. Dennis, D.D., the well-known writer on foreign missions, in an introduction, correctly describes the book as a missionary contribution to our knowledge of the world. The author knows his subject, not only from personal observation, but also from literary research; hence he quotes from English, Dutch, German, French, and Arabic authorities.

The book is undoubtedly of great value; and we trust that those who study it will include some who may be prepared to take the Gospel to the millions of Mohammedans in Arabia and elsewhere. Among the appendixes we note a very full bibliography relating to Arabia and Islam. The numerous illustrations include interesting and curious scenes and objects. By the way, it may be mentioned that the author regards with evident satisfaction the extension of British authority over the long sweep of the Arabian coast-line. On this Dr. Dennis remarks that Mr. Zwemer's "admiration and delight can only be fully understood by one who has been a resident in the East, and has felt the blight of Moslem rule, and its utter hopelessness as an instrument of progress."

Under the title of State Prohibition and Local Option, Messrs. Joseph Rowntree and Arthur Sherwell have issued the chapters on those subjects, unabridged, which appeared in the seventh edition of "The Temperance Problem and Social Reform." (1s. Hodder & Stoughton.)

Power in Preaching.*

By Dr. A. T. PIERSON.

IN pulpit oratory there are three elements, either of which may control: the text, the subject or theme, and the object or end aimed at. If the text rule, the result is an exposition or exegesis; if the subject, an essay or discourse; if the object to be attained be steadily kept in view, and control the disposition of the parts and the expression and delivery, we get what is, properly, a sermon.

The first thing to be fixed, in framing the normal sermon, is, therefore, the end or result to be reached; then we are ready to choose the best subject to reach the object, and the best text to develop the subject. Other methods may be and are employed with some success, but not with the highest success. If a man starts with a subject which he proposes to treat, he runs the risk of accommodating the text to the theme, rather than the theme to the text. In some such cases the notion which is the germ of the sermon is found in the preacher's brain rather than in the mind of God, and the use of Scripture is sometimes so foreign to its original purport and purpose that it becomes a caricature. Others start with a text which seems attractive or effective, and it is elaborated into an exposition more or less instructive and profitable. But if, in the course of its treatment, no other ultimate end is kept in view, there is risk of merely displaying ingenuity and originality in interpretation, interesting and perhaps instructing the hearer, but not grappling with his conscience and will, as in the most

ENERGETIC AND EFFECTIVE ORATORY.

The careful study of the preachers who have wielded most spiritual power will show that, although their methods are often defective and even crude, they are always seeking after souls. They may set all homiletical, rhetorical, and even grammatical laws at defiance, but, whether consciously or unconsciously, there is a definite purpose, evolved, perhaps, in the process of making or preaching the sermon, which purpose reacts upon the product. Many a discourse which began in the violation of this fundamental law of the sermon, has been remodelled while it was wrought. He who started with a topic or a text ends with an all-engrossing object—the saving or sanctifying of souls, the only object that can produce the ideal sermon.

If we are to have a new era of power in preaching, we must have a more definite result, toward which all else moves. An essay may be ingenious, and an exposition original, and yet lack oratorical power; as Whately said, the man "aims at nothing and hits it." Above all others, the preacher needs the power of an engrossing purpose. Then Betterton's remark to the Lord Bishop of London will no longer have point; that while "actors speak of things imaginary as though real, preachers speak of things real as though imaginary."

The Biblical Illustrator has now embraced so many books of Scripture, that it is a considerable library. Having completed the New Testament (twenty-seven volumes), the editor, Rev. Joseph Exell, is pushing forward with the Old. A recent addition to the series is Joshua, Judges, and Ruth, some 650 pages, full of expository and practical matter. As a collection of illustrative and homiletical helps, the Illustrator knows no rival, and busy workers find its pages remarkably suggestive. (7s. 6d Nisbet & Co.)

The Last Parable of Ezekiel, by Mrs. Frances Bevan. (2s. 6d. nett. C. J. Thynne.) It were impossible to study the last chapters of Ezekiel without plans, and here we have several of them. The volume is not an exposition of the wonderful vision, but an attempt to educe the spiritual significance of the record. Mrs. Bevan modestly describes her little book as "an attempt made by one who is neither learned nor skilful, to reach the inner meaning of the vision, which had for its purpose (see chap. xliii. 10) to make the soul ashamed." The pages are precious in their teaching. At the head of most of the chapters are poems, which embody very helpful thoughts pertinent to the subjects considered.

* From Evangelistic Work in Principle and Practice. By Arthur T. Pierson, D.D. (New edition, 2s. 6d. Passmore & Alabaster.) A book full of purpose, and calculated to help all classes of workers.

A Valuable Bible Help.

THERE are many books designed to expound and defend the Bible; but comparatively few whose object is to assist in a mental grasp of the Sacred Volume itself. To the concordance, which everyone should possess, the busy Christian worker is glad to add a Scripture Text-Book, or Bible Text Cyclopædia. A compilation in this line, but on a larger plan, and much more comprehensive and useful, is the INDEX-DIGEST OF THE HOLY SCRIPTURES, compiled by Orville J. Nave, A.M., D.D., LL.D., chaplain in the Army of the United States. This great work, upon which Dr. Nave and his wife were engaged for fourteen years, comprises over 20,000 topics and sub-topics, and 100,000 references to the Scriptures. It is a volume of 1,620 large pages, not reckoning a set of maps with index of names at the end.

The object of this book is to bring together in cyclopædic form, and under familiar headings, all that the Bible contains on particular subjects. The method pursued has been, first, to analyze topically each verse of the Bible, each series of verses, and each chapter and series of chapters; and, second, to group under suitable headings in alphabetical order all the Scriptures related to the subjects found in the analysis. Passages variously interpreted by different religious schools or accepted authorities are cited under the subjects they are claimed to support, without reference to the personal views of the author. And, mind, we have not merely the references, but the whole of which are printed in bold type, which it is a pleasure to read. There is an elaborate system of cross references to kindred and antithetical subjects. An index extending over 150 pages indicates the pages and columns in which each verse of the Bible is quoted—however frequently, and for whatever purpose. Names of persons and places are given as well as topics, throughout the work.

To illustrate: We take the word PRAYER. After a miscellany of minor sub-topics, affording suggestion at a glance for many a Bible talk, we have a list of unclassified Scriptures relating to the subject. Then come (1) cases in which answer is promised; (2) passages in which answer is acknowledged; and (3) instances of answered prayer. Next we have Scriptures on confession in prayer, then importunity, and afterwards cases of importunity. The remaining sections relate to intercessory prayer; the prayer of the wicked (not heard); pleas offered in prayer; and prayer and thanksgiving before taking food. In all, here are over fourteen pages of two columns each, presenting in full, for reading or study, the teaching of God's Word with reference to Prayer. Other topics are treated more at length, e.g., to "Church," twenty-seven pages are devoted; to "Commandments," fifteen; to "Death," thirteen; to "Faith," sixteen; to "God," eighty-eight; to "Jesus, the Christ," ninety.

The classification is admirably done. Dr. Nave tells us that he had the assistance of a practised lawyer—in fact, a Judge of the Supreme Court of Ohio—in preparing some of the most important sections. You ask what Scripture says on a great point of teaching. Open this book, and the passages on the subject are before you for immediate perusal and connected study.

Other features may be noted. Here is an analysis and classification of the Psalms according to their ruling subject; a list of the Old Testament passages quoted in the New; and a presentation, under the head of Select Readings, of those portions and incidents of Holy Writ which are, in the judgment of all men, regarded as literary gems. The book is a treasure-house for Christian workers. In America many thousands have been sold. It is beautifully produced, therefore somewhat expensive. For presentation purposes it is sure to be much in request; and for preachers and teachers who are jealous to make the Word their theme, we heartily recommend it. (15s. upwards, according to binding. Henry Frowde.)

Annual Volumes.

Early Days was never so attractive as to day. The letterpress is "the very thing" for the young, and the pictures good and numerous. (2s. C. H. Kelly.)

Sunday Reading for the Young is an old favourite. The contents are varied and wholesome, and the illustrations many, and such as appeal to the juvenile sense. (3s. and 5s., according to binding. Wells Gardner, Darton & Co.)

Vol. III. of The Puritan contains the January to October parts of the current year. It is a big book of over 800 pages, styled on the title page, "An Illustrated Magazine for Free Churchmen." Some of the articles are of great interest and lasting value; the portraits of notabilities are good; and the general contents varied and profitable reading. (4s. 6d. Andrew Melrose.)

The Zenana for 1900 is handsomely bound and fully illustrated. The information contained in this volume relating to the work of the Zenana Bible and Medical Mission, with biographical sketches of devoted missionaries, will be welcomed by those who follow the progress of this large and expanding agency, as well as serving to awaken and sustain sympathy with India's women. (2s. 6d. Partridge.)

Home Words, edited by Rev. Charles Bullock, has completed another year of service. In volume form it is at once useful and attractive, the stories, sketches, and other articles being such as promote sound thinking and right living, based on Christian truth and principles. A companion volume of equal worth is The Day of Days. (2s. each. Home Words Office, 11, Ludgate Square, Ludgate Hill, E.C.)

Little Folks Christmas Volume has pictures on nearly every page, many of them printed in colour. (Boards, 3s. 6d.; cloth, 5s. Cassell.) The contents include two serial stories and a number of short tales. There are sketches and articles for the youthful mind, also a variety of features and departments to entertain and instruct. This magazine is an old friend, and it never was more deservedly popular than to-day.

The annual volume of THE HERALD OF MERCY and THE REVIVAL is entitled, A Losing Game. It is a budget of excellent reading—pointed and well illustrated. These are pages "for the million;" and it is a pleasure to know that in monthly issues they are read with such hearty appreciation. The volume should find a place in all village and school libraries, and wherever it is found it will assuredly have readers. (1s. Morgan & Scott.)

The new volume of Bubbles, edited by Dr. Barnardo, is the twelfth in series, a fact which seems to indicate that this favourite magazine has come to stay. It is thus not merely a book of coloured pictures, but a repository of thought for little minds that want something to read as well as something to look at. The pages are particularly strong in regard to Natural History—the capable pen of Rev. Theodore Wood being in evidence throughout the volume. Geography and history are well presented in all their romance, not as mere matters of date and place-name. (Fancy boards, 3s. 6d.; cloth gilt, 5s. Office: 158, Aldersgate Street, E.C.)

The Quiver is a magazine which shows continual improvement. The Yearly Volume contains 1,150 pages, with 800 illustrations. There are stories by writers of acknowledged power and grace, and sketches on topics of passing and greater interest. A series entitled "The Life and Work of the Redeemer." includes contributions by Professor Handley Moule and the Archbishop of Armagh, with reproductions of many great works of art on sacred scenes. Another series of exceptional value is "The Christian's Book of Days"—notes of great men and events in association with the passing month. The illustrations generally are of a high order. (7s. 6d. Cassell & Co.)

The Animals' Friend has completed its sixth year, and the annual volumes have uniformly furnished an admirable selection of good reading on what may be called the humane interests. The rights of "Our Dumb Companions," and the duties of the "Lords of Creation," form the texts of papers that are well informed, and accompanied by an abundance of pictorial illumination, largely from photographs. The success of this monthly, so ably edited by Sidney G. Trist, is an encouraging set-off against prevalent indifference to the claims of mercy. Such as would begin a study of the subjects specified may be confidently referred to this volume as a source of varied information. (2s. 6d. Offices: 6, York Street, Covent Garden, W.C.)

The larger annuals issued by the Religious Tract Society keep pace with the demands of the day. In point of artistic illustration they are specially good. The Sunday at Home gives coloured reproductions of six of Tissot's wonderful pictures of the life of Christ. There are several stories—some for children; sermons and devotional papers by well-known writers, and biographical sketches of an entertaining and instructive character. The Leisure Hour volume is the first of a new series. The pages are somewhat smaller, and number 1,100. There are running stories by Sir Walter Besant and Louis Becke. The shorter articles on Science and Discovery, Over-sea Notes, and the Varieties are diverting and useful. (7s. 6d. each.)

The volume of the Sunday Magazine is as good as its many excellent predecessors. Among the most valuable series is "The Religious Element in the Poets," by the Bishop of Ripon—twelve papers of great interest. The running tale is "The Heiress of the Forest," by Eleanor C. Price; the short stories are numerous. There are biographical sketches of celebrities, articles on mission work, and expository studies. The pages are practical and diverting in useful proportions, and fully illustrated. The companion volume, Good Words, has features which equally deserve appreciative recognition. The serial is by John Buchan, and is entitled "The Half-Hearted." The literary and historical papers are of a high order, and the readings in science and travel will yield instruction and entertainment to young and old. (7s. 6d. each. Isbister & Co.)

The smaller annuals of the Religious Tract Society enjoy a well-deserved popularity. For bright interior and attractive exterior they leave nothing to be desired. For the young there are Our Little Dots, with pretty pictures and stories in large type; and for little ones who are improving with their reading, The Child's Companion, quite a delightful book, handsomely bound (2s. 6d. each). Light in the Home is a great advance upon the old "Tract Magazine," which it succeeds and continues (1s. 6d.). The Cottager and Artisan has been a blessing in many a home, and it is worthy of high commendation as a repository of good reading for the people (1s. 6d.). Lastly comes Friendly Greetings, another book for the home. It is full of short readings, accompanied by illustrations and illuminated plates (2s. 6d.). While singularly useful as they come out month by month, these magazines perform an additional ministry in the form of volumes, all of them so bound as to be suitable for presentation purposes.

Calendars and Diaries.

The George Herbert Calendar is a block, with quotations from the writings of George Herbert, for every day in the year, special reference being made to the chief Church seasons. It has been arranged by S. M. du Pré. (1s. nett. Elliot Stock.)

The Ministers' Pocket Diary and Clerical Vade Mecum for 1901 sustains its varied and useful features. As a note-book its service is much enhanced by the adequacy of its carefully compiled and condensed information. (2s. Hodder & Stoughton.)

The issue of the Roll Text and Almanack for 1901 has the features that have made it useful in past years. The type is large and clear. The Bible-Searching Almanac is another good publication, providing a capital exercise in Scripture knowledge for young and old. (1d. each. Shaw & Co.)

The Golden Grain Almanack is so called because of its spiritual tone and substance. It is an old friend, and the issue for 1901 has some beautiful poetical excerpts, as well as Scripture selections. (Paper, 1d.; large type, 2d.; cloth, interleaved, 6d.) The Golden Grain Almanack and Diary (1s. 6d. nett), bound in roan, with pocket tuck, is a very useful publication, and as neat as it is useful. (J. E. Hawkins.)

Workers among French folk, especially in visitation at their homes, will be glad to hear of a capital wall-sheet Almanach de l'Ami de la Maison, 1901. (10 centimes; post free, 15 centimes. Manuel Vasseur, 4, Place du Théâtre Français, Paris.) Another useful publication of Swiss origin is, Almanach du Temperant, which appears for the fifteenth year. It is a substantial pamphlet, with illustrated readings following the calendar. (30 cent. Office, 4, Boulevard du Théâtre, Geneva.)

Those who are studying the Ritualistic question with thoroughness should not overlook The Reformation Settlement: Examined in the Light of History and Law, by Canon Malcolm MacColl, D.D. (new and cheaper edition; 3s. 6d. net. Longmans & Co.). This book of over 800 pages is full of historical and legal information; and though written from a High Anglican point of view, it has a general value on account of the admissions made in favour of Protestant contentions.

Several books of great value on "neglected topics" are issued in the "Self and Sex" series. We have already called attention to "What a Young Boy Ought to Know," and "What a Young Man Ought to Know." Now it is a pleasure to commend What a Young Husband Ought to Know, by the same author as the preceding books, namely, Rev. Sylvanus Stall, D.D. In the same series, there are useful books for young women, edited by Dr. Mary Wood-Allen. These works will not disappoint the expectations of Christian people. The pages deal with matters of vital importance; but they are at once pure and candid. (4s. nett. Vir Publishing Company, 7, Imperial Arcade, Ludgate Circus, E.C.)

Back to Christ.*

By Rev. GEORGE JACKSON, B.A.

"BACK to Christ," men cry. Yes; but to what Christ? To the Christ of the whole Gospels, and all the Gospels—the Christ of the Fourth as well as of the First Gospel—the Christ who was born of the Virgin Mary, who wrought great miracles, who died on Calvary, who rose again from the dead, who ascended into heaven, and who ever liveth to make intercession for us? Back to that Christ? Amen, and amen! He it is whom, through all her history, the Church has worshipped as Lord and God; we live but as we live in Him. But if when men say, "Back to Christ," they mean "Back to Jesus of Nazareth, a good man who went about doing good, who spake undying words of truth and love, and died a holy martyr's death"—if that is all they mean we can only answer, "No! ten thousand times no!" for there is not, and there never has been, and there never can be, salvation by example or ethics alone, though they be the example and ethics of Jesus.

What is it that has given to the words of Jesus their unique power in the minds and hearts of men? Is it not the fact that they are his words, the words of Him whose glory John beheld, "glory as of the only begotten from the father"? And separate from Him, they are lifeless, and ineffectual, and proclaim no Gospel. It is in the revelation of what He was and did, even more than in what He said; of his life and death, even more than in his words, that men have found healing and peace. As Dr. Dale has said, with profound truth, Christ came not so much to preach a Gospel, as rather that there MIGHT BE A GOSPEL TO PREACH.

His coming meant much more than the issue of a revised and enlarged edition of the Moral Law; it meant the bringing in of a new power that should make for righteousness; it meant the pouring of a new tide of life into the world's poor shrunken veins. And until we understand this, the New Testament will remain, for the most part, a sealed book to us. Paul and John and Peter have comparatively little to say in exposition of the moral precepts of Jesus; it is upon Himself and the mighty work He wrought that they fix their adoring eyes; and however we may stumble at it, it is difficult to believe that either the Apostle himself or those who had put themselves to school with his Epistle to the Colossians, would have hesitated to sign their acceptance of the Nicene Creed.

Nor is there in all this — need it be said? — any depreciation of the Sermon on the Mount. The foolish and superficial persons who dismiss it as "mere morality" may themselves be dismissed without further notice. It is rather, as one writer well says, "The summit of Christianity, a summit which the farthest-climbing saints see far off in the dim distance." But what I want us to realize is, that if all that Christ had done for us had been to set up this fair ideal, then had He never been the world's Saviour. My old theological professor staggered some of us in his class-room one day when he told us bluntly, that if we only had the Sermon on the Mount we should be lost. But one at least of his students has learned the truth of his words. Men are not going astray because there is no one to cry: "This is the way, walk ye in it;" they are not stumbling into the pit because there is no one to warn them of their peril. The Sermon on the Mount is the law for them that have entered into life; it is not the way of life itself.

Side-Lights on the War in South Africa, by Jessica Sykes, is a volume of very readable sketches based on personal observation during a few weeks' residence in Cape Colony and Natal. (3s. 6d. T. Fisher Unwin.)

* From A Young Man's Religion. By Rev. George Jackson, B.A. (3s. 6d. Hodder & Stoughton). A volume of great truths and strong arguments. Here is food for the mind, and teaching for the heart. It is a book for thoughtful people of all ages.

How to Prevent Famine.

THROUGHOUT his life Sir Arthur Cotton was engaged upon large concerns; hence the story of his career is instructive rather than entertaining. It is not a book for everyone; but for British statesmen and Indian administrators it is a volume of grave import. Those who are interested in great public works in promotion of human well-being will find reading to their mind in General Sir Arthur Cotton, R.E., K.C.S.I.: His Life and Work. By his Daughter, Lady Hope. With some Famine-Prevention Studies, by William Digby, C.I.E. (12s. nett. Hodder & Stoughton).

This is not merely the outline of a noble life; it is also the vindication of a man of genius. The personality of Sir Arthur Cotton was recently described in these pages: his family associations were high, as he himself was distinguished. But, in a special degree, Sir Arthur will be remembered as a man of great deeds and constructive philanthropy. Consistent as a Christian man, and patriotic as a Briton, he was beyond everything ingenious and mighty as an engineer. His name will long be a household word among millions in the Madras Presidency of India; for there was the sphere of his greatest undertakings in the storing of water, irrigating the land, and providing waterways in the service of man. His monument is seen in works on the Godavari, the Kistna, and the Cauveri, great rivers of India.

This handsome volume of 600 pages is beautiful with its portraits, maps, and other illustrations. Passing the early life and travels of its revered subject, we come to delineations of the public works which he carried into execution. These are deeply impressive. Canals, locks, tanks, aqueducts, bridges, and other structures and excavations remain as instruments of blessing to millions of people; and where they are, and in other places where Sir Arthur's principles of water storage have been acted upon, famine has been averted in years when little or no rain has fallen. These pages describe the General's work and defend his career; they recount discussions in Parliament, and give the points of exciting departmental controversies.

As the years went by, it was his joy to hear of untold good resulting from his operations; his sorrow, on the other hand, to observe the flagrant neglect of extending such benefits to needy districts in India. The present Viceroy has given noble testimony to the value of irrigation, and he has drawn word-pictures of jungle and wilderness regions turned into gardens thereby, and blossoming as the rose. Where such works have been carried out famine is unknown. Any single famine costs, in money alone, more than would be required to apply Sir Arthur's methods on a large scale. Those who are concerned in the welfare of the people of India, and would study questions of irrigation and navigation alongside questions of railway transit and agriculture, not to say inquire into the causes of famine and the incidence of taxation in our great dependency, should read this weighty book.

In later years Sir Arthur lived in retirement at Dorking. His various inventions are described, and particulars given of his method of cultivating the land to the best account. One of the plates shows him standing in front of some English wheat six feet high; another in front of a plot of maize, still higher, grown by him in 1896. He held that plants need air as well as water; by aëration of the soil he secured marvellous results. One summer, when there was no grass in his neighbourhood, grass grew in profusion on his experimental plots. It was abundant and luxuriant, although he had not given it a drop of water. The depth of the soil and the method of cultivation accounted for his crop.

By giving us this book, Lady Hope has discharged a useful service, as well as performed an act of filial affection; while Mr. Digby has reduced to permanent and accessible form facts and discussions of supreme importance as bearing on the welfare of India.

Chinese Sketches.

MRS. BRYSON, of the London Missionary Society, whose work in China has more than once been brought before our readers, is a good writer. This has been shown by her several works, and is again demonstrated by her beautiful book, Child Life in China. (2s. 6d. Religious Tract Society.) Profusely illustrated, and written for young readers, this volume will admirably meet a demand of the hour. The reader is afforded vivid glimpses of the children of China, in the home and at school, at play and engaged in idolatrous exercises. The concluding chapter addresses the heart of the "happy English child," with an appeal to help the cause of missions to the benighted millions of the Flowery Land.

A more comprehensive book, for readers of maturer age, is Chinamen at Home, by Thomas G. Selby, twelve years missionary in China. (3s. 6d. net. Hodder & Stoughton.) Here we have, to begin with, descriptions of cities and city life, and villages and village life. Then we are told of the Chinaman's teachers and ceremonial institutions, and his partiality for his own civilization. There are chapters on inland travel and work outside the treaty ports. Missionary work is thoughtfully dealt with, and the pages are well worthy the attention of friends of missions. Mr. Selby says:—

> The spirit of independence in the Chinaman will not allow him to be a permanent dependant upon the subsidies of missionary societies, and large numbers of self-supporting native churches are already found in many provinces of the empire. The Chinaman's opposition to railways abates when they are no longer constructed by foreign moneys and administered by foreign officials; and the Christian Church in China will pass through a corresponding history. It will escape prejudice when European control and direction are minimized, and progress will then be rapid and unchecked. The very conservatism of the Chinese character gives promise of a stable Christianity in the near future.

Sunday-school workers will find in the Westminster Teacher much that is helpful and instructive. This monthly publication deals with the Sunday School Lessons, the expositions of which are from the pen of Dr. J. R. Miller, Mr. Robert E. Speer, and others. Each number comprises useful suggestions for teaching, terse critical notes, &c. (3d. Presbyterian Publication Committee, 14, Paternoster Square.)

The Sinner's Approach to God.*

By Preb. H. W. WEBB-PEPLOE, M.A.

THE high priest entered the Holy of Holies once a year; but he dared not stay there: he must hasten forth lest he die. The old Jewish writers tell us that the man who was called to fulfil that awful ceremonial of representing Israel before God used to hurry out lest he should be smitten for his own unworthiness, and that he made haste to escape from the majesty of God; but I would have you remember that our High Priest takes his place before God, not merely as the Representative, but as the Inclusive Man, and that He has an uninterrupted session at the right hand of God. He passed in when the gates were opened, according to the words of the prophecy: "Lift up your heads, O ye gates: even lift them up, ye everlasting doors; and the King of Glory shall come in." He went up to the very throne of the Father as the Representative and the Inclusive Man, and He never comes forth again except to bring blessing to his own people, and judgment upon those who resist his authority, in that last great day when the Church shall be complete.

But, meantime, He is there in heaven "for us;" and being there, He not only prevails to represent our needs, and to plead our cause before offended justice, but He has taken us with Him, if we are believers. He took his own people up to the very throne of God; and where Christ is, the believer is (judicially); and from the very moment he believes, he may claim to draw nigh to God as his own Father without fear. It matters not one atom about his natural depravity, or the extent of the sins that he has committed; he may sit where Christ sits, and God can gaze upon him with satisfaction: for he is in Christ Jesus, in the presence of God, and has been purged with the precious blood of Christ.

What, then, do we want with a human priest, who can only offer up a sacrifice day by day, whether of bullocks and sheep, or of bread and wine? The priests can never offer anything but that which is in itself unworthy of God's acceptance, and which can never in itself make atonement, or in any sense whatever propitiate God for sin. Yet we are told to believe that the Sacrament is in every way commemorative, and more than commemorative, of the sacrifice of Christ, for that it really does propitiate God and bring peace to men. "When we speak," says Mr. Staley, "of the Holy Eucharist as a sacrifice, we do not understand any repetition of the sacrifice of the Cross, or any renewal of Christ's sufferings or death. His sufferings and his death took place once for all, and can never be repeated. Neither are we to suppose that anything is wanting in his sufferings or sacrifice which the Eucharistic sacrifice supplies. But we mean that in the Holy Eucharist we plead before God the one sacrifice offered once upon the Cross, even as Christ Himself presents the same offering in heaven. Thus the Fathers spoke of the Holy Eucharist as the 'unbloody sacrifice.' The Eucharistic Sacrifice is not so much on a line with the Sacrifice on Calvary, as with the pleading of that sacrifice in heaven." (Staley's "Catholic Religion," p. 251.) Much is said about the views of the Fathers on this matter of the Eucharistic Sacrifice. But let us go behind the Fathers to the Grandfathers, who are the Apostles. . . . We find no mention of any sacrifice but one; and we are assured that "by one offering He hath perfected for ever them that are sanctified."

* From Christ and His Church: Chapters on the Protestant Faith. By Rev. H. W. Webb-Peploe, M.A., Prebendary of St. Paul's Cathedral. A volume of sermons and addresses, including one delivered at the Church Congress in 1899. They set forth Anglican teaching from a Protestant standpoint, and in the vigorous language of which Mr. Webb-Peploe has such powerful command. (2s. 6d. Nisbet & Co.)

Life of George Whitefield.

AS an evangelist and philanthropist, George Whitefield must be accorded a place all his own in the story of the great Revival of the eighteenth century. In words that are generally familiar, the late Bishop Ryle said: "Of all the spiritual heroes of a hundred years ago, none saw so soon as Whitefield what the times demanded, and none were so forward in the great work of aggression. I should think I committed an act of injustice if I placed any name before his."

It is a peculiar pleasure to welcome a new life of this man of God: George Whitefield, M.A., Field-Preacher, by Rev. James Paterson Gledstone. (6s. Hodder & Stoughton.) Nearly thirty years ago the same author gave us "The Life and Travels of George Whitefield." This has long been out of print; and to meet a continued interest, Mr. Gledstone has prepared this volume, which presents the story in a more compact form. It is a pleasure to read on the title page the preacher's own vindication of his prodigious open-air exertions: "Every one hath his proper gift. Field-Preaching is my plan; in this I am carried as on eagle's wings; God makes way for me everywhere."

A book about Whitefield (1714-1770) could hardly be unattractive reading. This work is all that one could desire—ample in details, clear in arrangement, and written with much force as well as deep sympathy. It is no bald narrative; every page has some striking fact or story—some things that may astonish such as would complacently associate everything that is aggressive and ingenious with our own days. The story of Whitefield's Orphanage and Medical Mission in America has an up-to-date ring about it, and the practical Christianity of the founder is shown to have been supported by a faith that was simple and strong.

One day when he found himself forsaken and almost quite penniless, his suspense was broken by a stranger coming and putting a guinea into his hand; then something seemed to say, "Cannot that God who sent this person to give me this guinea, make it up to 1,500?" And the inward voice was not untrue; soon he was making his apostolic circuit in Wiltshire, Essex, and other counties, and everywhere his orphans found friends.

The trials as well as encouragements of the devoted worker are admirably depicted—the scoffing as well as the patronage. The manner and degree in which he was misunderstood is pathetic reading. The controversies in which he was engaged, or declined to be embroiled, have their profitable reflection as well as their sad side; and we could not wish a better treatment than they receive in Mr. Gledstone's pages. The work in Scotland was marvellous; and there is a capital account of the Cambuslang Revival, with its sequel—a public fast called by the Secession Presbytery in token of humiliation for "the diabolical delusion that had seized the people!"

It is the life of a many-sided man which Mr. Gledstone has placed in our hands. A man who never lost his hold upon the crowds that gathered to him, who preached 18,000 times, or more than ten times a week for four and thirty years—in the course of which he was again and again prostrated with illness, and compelled to take long and tedious voyages. One month's labours are recorded in this brief sentence—"He preached to 10,000 persons every day for twenty-eight days." Whitefield was universally popular, and his popularity never waned. In England, Scotland, and America his labours were herculean, and marvellously blessed.

Free from denominational trammels, Whitefield was great in prayer. Hence one secret of his great usefulness in the hand of God. If, as we trust, revival lies near ahead, this is a volume that has a definite message for all who would have part in Gospel work. Preachers cannot but read to profit—open-air workers should, in particular, find encouragement from the story. Like the life of Moody, this is a book which wealthy Christians should take an interest in circulating among such as cannot buy for themselves, but are eager to read. Every page has something that may be turned to account in service for Christ.

The Life of D. L. Moody.

THE demand for the life story of the late D. L. Moody has been very large, especially in America, where personal interest was so widely combined with acquaintance in Christian work. In this country the book has found its way, by ordinary channels, and as a consequence of the generous provision of thoughtful Christians, to the shelves of large numbers of ministers and other workers; and we have heard of no single case in which the perusal has not left a powerful impression for good, and acted as a strong stimulant to renewed and more vigorous Evangelistic endeavour.

The title of the Official Authorized Edition is well known—The Life of Dwight L. Moody. By his Son, W. R. Moody. It is issued by Morgan & Scott, and the library editions, well suited for presentation purposes, include many copyright portraits and views among the hundred and more illustrations. The book has been taken up with avidity by friends of Gospel work; but, determined that the price shall not stand in the way of a still more extensive demand, the publishers have issued

A NEW AND CHEAPER EDITION AT 5s.

This is a handsome book, with all the letterpress of the standard edition, and over eighty of the illustrations. This also is a capital presentation book.

It were needless to say much as to the conspicuous success achieved by Mr. W. R. Moody in this great biography. For sympathy with its subject and ability to deal with the abundant material available, no more fitting writer could have been found. The result, however, has exceeded the expectations even of those who knew most of the writer, and were above all desirous that full justice should be done to the great worker whose departure is yet so deeply mourned. Above most, this is a book with a great purpose, and that it has already been influential in a high degree, encourages the conviction that it will run through many more editions, both here and in America.

One of the best of the many volumes of meditation by the late Dr. J. R. Macduff was St. Paul's Song of Songs. As an unfolding of Rom. viii., the pages are suggestive in a high degree. (New and cheap edition; Thynne, Great Queen Street, W.C. 1s. 6d. nett.)

Story Books.

Much solid literary merit and considerable thought help the story of Olive Tracy to a worthy position in the writings of Amy le Feuvre. The history of the heroine will command not only interest, but unfailing admiration. (6s. Hodder & Stoughton.)

Long Live the King is a powerfully written story. Freshness of style, lucidity in setting forth the adventures of its heroes, and the old-time manners of some of the characters, combine to make a fascinating and delightful work. (6s. Ward, Lock, & Co.)

The Boer's Blunder: A Veldt Adventure, by Fox Russell (6s. Wells Gardner, Darton & Co.), depicts experiences in Cape Colony shortly after the affair of Majuba Hill. A capital idea is afforded of life among the Boers—good as a picture, not always good in word or deed.

The Purple Robe, by Joseph Hocking (3s. 6d. Ward, Lock & Co.), apart from its merits as a story, will prove useful in spreading Protestant principles, and in exposing the fallacies of the Romish Church. It may appropriately be placed in the hands of any who have leanings Romeward.

As its title suggests, Love in Our Village, by Orme Angus, is a picture of rural life. Numerous episodes are portrayed with wonderful fidelity, furnishing an abundance of genial, wholesome humour. The book is admirably illustrated by Bertha Newcombe. (6s. Ward, Lock, & Co.)

The Madness of David Baring, by Joseph Hocking. (3s. 6d. Hodder & Stoughton.) The hero of this tale, a man of wealth, got "tired of the world of money," and of "a life where everything is sold to the highest bidder," and joined a socialistic brotherhood. After vexatious experiments, his eyes were opened to other views, and then he was glad that his fortune had not been alienated in accordance with instructions he had given. There is love as well as money in the story, which, as might be guessed, "ends well."

W. & R. Chambers.

The Three Witches, by Mrs. Molesworth (3s. 6d.), is in the best style of that favourite writer, and furnished with striking illustrations by Louis Baumer.

Miss Nonentity, by L. T. Meade (5s.), is a more substantial book. The heroine will excite the wonderment of our girls. The illustrations are from the pencil of W. Rainy.

Celia's Conquest, by L. E. Tiddeman (2s. 6d.), is not a love story, as might at first be guessed. It describes the experiences of a spoilt and self-willed girl, who conquered herself. How this was brought about, the story shows in a manner calculated to entertain boy and girl readers.

J. F. Shaw & Co.

An excellent story is worked around A Comrade's Troth, by E. A. Gillie (3s. 6d.). The sentiment is noble, with an occasional smack of Scottish humour in the dialogue.

Dr. Gordon Stables is facile princeps among writers for boys, and his reputation is well sustained by England's Hero Prince: A Story of the Black Prince (5s.). It is dedicated by its sailor-author to the naval cadets of H.M.S. Britannia, and is grand reading for our boys.

The Master of Fernhurst, by E. Everett-Green (3s. 6d.), has the sterling qualities of that well-known author. The pages are full of animation, and religious questions are freely discussed. What is more, the prevailing note is in harmony with Scripture teaching and Christian consistency.

Another volume by Miss Everett-Green is In Cloister and Court; or, the White Flower of a Blameless Life (5s.). It tells the story of good Bishop Ken, and is admirably illustrated. An abundance of incident is woven round the outstanding events in the life of the distinguished non-juror bishop.

S. W. Partridge & Co.

The Three-Cornered House is a striking story of fresh, vivid, and absorbing interest, admirably illustrated. Temperance principles are advocated. (3s. 6d.)

The Fatal Nugget, by E. Harcourt Burrage, is a story of adventure for boys. Raymond's Angel, a story of two lives laid down, by Blanche Gavrock, is less exciting, and more elevating in tone. (1s. each.)

A pleasantly written story of country life, full of incident and movement, is The Burtons of Burdale, by J. W. Kneeshaw. The author succeeds in maintaining our interest from beginning to end. (2s. 6d.)

The sketches reproduced in Manchester Stories have already appeared in various religious journals, and will be welcomed by many in a permanent form. The tales are of uniform merit, and entitle their author to rank as a careful student of character and human nature. (1s. 6d.)

The name of Miss Charlotte Murray is familiar to many. Her new story—Muriel Malone—will introduce the writer to still wider spheres. It is the work of one whose true and edifying representations of Christian character, in both high and commonplace walks of life, are marked by exquisite simplicity and sincerity of manner. The book is one of sound purpose, at times deeply spiritual, always elevating in tone. (2s. 6d.)

T. Nelson & Sons.

The new publications of this house include: Life of General Charles Gordon, by M. B. Synge (1s.)—a brightly written record of a noble life.

Up the Creeks, a Tale of Adventure in West Africa, by Edward Shirley (1s. 6d.), is informing as well as entertaining.

One of Buller's Horse, a tale of the Zulu campaign, by William Johnston (3s. 6d.)—exciting in narrative and realistic in pictorial embellishments.

The Red, White, and Green, by Herbert Hayens (5s.), takes us back to 1848 and following years, when Hungary rebelled against Austrian rule, and fought for freedom. We are on the track of Kossuth, Görgei, Bem, and other men of weight and daring.

A tale of exceptional interest is After Worcester: the Story of a Royal Fugitive. By E. Everett-Green. (5s.) It is "founded on fact," and introduces very readable fiction into association with the events of the six weeks of the wanderings of Charles II. from the field of Worcester, and his final escape. The story will help the historical memory of elders, as well as instruct younger folk in the outlines of a famous insurrection.

Ye Mariners of England, also by Herbert Hayens (6s.), is well described on the title-page as "a Boy's Book of the Navy." It tells the story of England's warships from the earliest days until now. It is historical and descriptive, enlarging upon great events and acts of heroism. The illustrations are numerous and excellent, and include portraits of national worthies, reproductions of famous paintings, pictures of favourite ships, and outstanding incidents in the wonderful record. Though not one who delights in war, the author is proud of the British Navy; and his pages will assuredly thrill and interest all who read them.

Religious Tract Society.

A story of average merit is About Peggy Saville, by Jessie Mansergh, which gives a picture of somewhat worldly family life. (2s. 6d.)

As its title suggests, That Scholarship Boy, by Emma Leslie, is a sketch of school life, entertaining and enjoyable. Lads will learn much from its obvious though unobtrusive moral. (1s.)

Mary E. Palgrave's Between Two Opinions is a pleasant story, embodying a protest against the selfishness and narrowness of aim which too often characterize the leisured classes. (2s.)

The sorrows of slum children are pathetically pictured by Hesba Stretton in The Lord's Purse Bearers. Incidentally, the book is a powerful indictment of indiscriminate alms-giving. (1s. 6d.)

A posthumous work of Rev. S. S. Pugh, Geoff Blake, His Chums and His Foes, portrays the character and school experiences of a brave Christian lad. The story is well told. The illustrations are by Lancelot Speed. (2s. 6d.)

The Schoolmistress of Haven's End, by Ella Edersheim Overton, is a fascinating sketch of the school career and philanthropic labours of a village governess. There are vivid touches of pathos and kindly humour. (2s.)

The aim of the author of Enid Duncan; or, The Discipline of a Year, is to show how life is sacrificed at the shrine of Ritualism, and the extent to which childish innocence and influence may be used in correcting mistaken and misguided victims of priestcraft.

Readers of Daniel's Fallen Dagon will not be likely to put down the book until the last page has been reached, so naturally is interest in character-sketching sustained. As a Sunday-school prize, its appreciation by elder scholars may be assured. (1s. 6d.)

In Through a Needle's Eye the authoress of "Jessica's First Prayer" gives us a book of high religious tone, somewhat mournful, but consistent and impressive. The characters are cleverly drawn and contrasted. The sunny old lighthouse-keeper and his wife are delightful figures. (3s. 6d.)

Allan Adair: or, Here and There in Many Lands, by Dr. Gordon Stables, R.N. (3s. 6d.) It is after the best style of its well-known author, the hero being followed in the Arctic regions as well as the tropics. Dr. Stables has literary resource as well as great powers of narration; so that his pages are at once enlightening and diverting.

As a stirring tale for boys, it would be difficult to match Tom Wallis, a tale of the South Seas. By Louis Becke. (5s.) The author's knowledge of life in the islands of the Pacific is matter of common repute; his power as a story-teller needs no witness beyond this book, the pages of which are at once entertaining and instructive.

A volume of reminiscences of life in the South Sea Islands is Adventures in the South Pacific, by One who was Born there. The book conveys much information as to the former conditions of the islanders, and the progress of civilizing forces among them. Occasional passages happily illustrate the transforming effect of missionary effort. (2s. 6d.)

Gold in the Furnace, by M. H. Cornwall Legh, might have had for a sub-title, "A Story for Domestics." (3s. 6d.) It is especially calculated to afford pleasure and profit to young persons of that class, describing, as it does, the Christian character of a parlour-maid wrongfully accused of theft. The book is admirably illustrated from drawings by Lancelot Speed.

Life's Anchor: A tale of the days of Dr. Johnson and Hannah More. By Harriet E. Colvile. (2s. 6d.) History and imagination are pleasantly combined in these pages. Interest turns at times upon the infidelity which prevailed in the eighteenth century; and weighty words by Dr. Johnson (taken chiefly from Boswell) are introduced on this and other subjects of importance, moral and religious.

Tib and Tib, by Stella Austin (2s. 6d. Wells Gardner, Darton & Co.) will amuse the children, and possibly give them wholesome views of mischievous behaviour.

Ethel Turner (Mrs. H. R. Curlewis) has given us Three Little Maids (3s. 6d. Ward, Lock & Co.) It is a family story, with many trials and much travelling.

An eventful chapter of history of Stuart times is brought before the reader of Sylvia's Romance. The narrative is full of life and colour, conveying instruction and delight (1s. Wells Gardner, Darton & Co.)

A story that will be read with pleasure by the young people is The Crew of the Jolly Sandboy, by Julia Stack. It is a pleasantly written tale of the adventures, by sea and land, of two lost children, and is well illustrated. (1s. Wells Gardner, Darton, & Co.)

Church of England Temperance Society.

Recent publications include:—The Squires of Karrondale (1s. 6d.), which is a handsome addition to the "Azalea" series; Units in a Crowd (1s.), a pathetic story of rescue work in the West of London; and Leap Frog (1s.), a happy and amusing narrative for boys. The C.E.T.S. Speakers' and Workers' Vade Mecum (1s. 6d.), is indispensable to those who would be conversant with the principles, policy, and methods of the Society. It is also a compendium of useful information for organizers and general workers. Band of Hope Outline Addresses (4d.) contains suggestive topics for thirteen discourses to young people. The Temperance Movement in Church and Nation (6d.) forms a new course of lessons for adult societies on the educational, national, and legislative phases of the subject. The Historical Syllabus will be found to serve a similar and useful purpose in the instruction of juvenile branches. A new service of song, The Lonely Island (4d.), is an abridgement of Mr. R. M. Ballantyne's deeply interesting story, accompanied by tuneful compositions admirably arranged. New leaflets, &c., suitable for distribution are also issued, as well as numerous tracts, reciters, and dialogues.

Nursery Books.

Two good nursery books are—Days Out of Doors: A Book of Pictures, Tales, and Poetry; and Tea-Table Stories for Little People. (1s. each. Sunday-School Union.) Another bright book is In Pinafore Land, by Flora Klickmann. (1s. Ward, Lock & Co.)

Messrs. Nelson & Sons have brought out some grand coloured books for the nursery. Baby's Picture Book is what it claims to be, with no letterpress to puzzle the admiring little ones. The Iron Horse depicts engines and trains; A Life on the Ocean Wave is gay with pictures of steam and sailing vessels; and The Farmer's Friends is a panorama of birds and cattle. Pleasant verses accompany the picture-pages in the last three publications. (All 1s. each.)

Tom Leslie's Secret, and What Came of It, by Blanche Atkinson, is a story for the little ones. It is one of the "Green Nursery" series, and suitably illustrated. (1s. Sunday School Union.)

A book for thoughtful people is Rev. R. A. Torrey's How to Pray. Whether setting forth the positive conditions of prevailing prayer, or defining the hindrances to acceptable supplication the author is lucid in his teaching and practical in his application. The chapters dealing with the time and place of prayer, and the need of a revival, are timely and suggestive. (1s. 6d. Nisbet.)

Mr. W. T. Stead explains that his sketch, Mrs. Booth, of the Salvation Army, is "an attempt to portray her influence on the making of modern England." Mr. Stead quotes liberally from the official "Life," and gives some choice and welcome extracts from the writings of this remarkable and devoted Englishwoman. It is not surprising, but it is none the less a pity, that Mr. Stead mars his work by the advocacy of spiritualism. (2s. 6d. Nisbet & Co.)

Seasonable Messages.

In Old Faithful; or, The Gospel in a Geyser, Rev. E. W. Moore, of Wimbledon, draws a number of spiritual lessons from the characteristics of the famous geyser in Yellowstone Park, U.S.A.

Miss Charlotte Murray's New Year's greeting is entitled The Diadem of Honour. Important truths bearing upon Christian character and service are brought out with a wealth of happy illustration.

In days when the anxieties and burdens of life press heavily, many will welcome the booklet Too Heavy for Me, by Sophia M. Nugent, which is full of encouraging messages founded on Holy Scripture.

Originally given as an address, and now issued as a booklet, Two Ways to Heaven, and Two Ways to Hell sets forth the points of a picture which in some respects resembles the familiar "The Broad and the Narrow Way."

(All 1d. each, and issued by Partridge & Co.)

The Transfiguration of Peace, by Rev. R. C. Gillie, M.A., has also a timely message. The Saviour's greeting, "Peace be unto you," is applied to (1) the soul, (2) the family, and (3) the nation. This is a beautiful Christmas or New Year's booklet. (1s. J. F. Shaw & Co.)

Miscellaneous.

The Sunday School Union has issued a very attractive edition of Kingsley's Westward Ho. (2s.)

Mr. Andrew Melrose has published a second series of Quiet Hours, by John Pulsford, D.D. (2s. 6d.) The pages are rich in fruitful thought.

A Christmas Homily, by Rev. P. Barclay, M.A., presents inspiring thoughts upon the Incarnation and its meaning. (6d. net. Elliot Stock.)

Miss Eliza Sharp's booklet, Steps, is designed to afford spiritual guidance and help to believers. (8d. per doz. Hayward, 42, George Street, Croydon.)

Useful Legal Information for the use of rescue workers and district visitors, is the title of a concise pamphlet, issued by the National Vigilance Association. (1d. 319, High Holborn.)

In Around the Fire, Mrs. Haycraft gives us a readable volume of short stories, pleasantly written, and inculcating helpful lessons. It makes a desirable Christmas gift book for young women. (2s. Partridge.)

One of Australia's Daughters is an autobiography of Mrs. Harrison Lee, whose enthusiastic labours in the temperance cause have won her the esteem of many in this country, as well as in the land of her birth. (2s. Ideal Publishing Union.)

Under the title of Heart Talks on Holiness, the Salvation Army Headquarters issues a series of papers on Sanctification, by Brigadier Brengle, an American Salvationist, who has already written helpfully upon the subject. (6d. 79, Fortess Road, N.W.)

Keep to the Right! is the title of a little volume of outline addresses to children, by Grace Winter. Some of the chapters appeared in our columns. Taken in their entirety, the addresses will prove suggestive and helpful to Christian workers. (1s. 6d. S. S. Union.)

A sketch of a beautiful and fruitful life has been given us by H.C.N—Phillis Seymour. (1s. 6d.) Marshall Bros.) At St. Pancras, Holloway, Oswaldtwistle, Wandsworth, and other places she laboured with signal devotion. An appendix gives notes of some of her Bible readings.

The Open Air Cure for Consumption is a substantial pamphlet by A Fellow Sufferer. Here we have the free, fresh air treatment fully explained, with much advice that is very practical. The pages should prove helpful to many. (6d. E. Hawker, 59, Blessington Road, Blackheath, S.E.)

Mr. C. D. Michael has selected from the literature of heroism in everyday life nearly thirty stories, for the most part well written, and all of them worth reading. Entitled Deeds of Daring, the book is illustrated, and will be read with interest by young and old. (1s. 6d. Partridge.)

Messrs Hodder & Stoughton are issuing some of Dr. J. R. Miller's very helpful addresses in neat booklet form, beautifully printed and handsomely bound. Secrets of Happy Home Life and The Blessing of Cheerfulness are before us. We trust they will be widely circulated. (1s. each.)

Right Living as a Fine Art is a study of Channing's "Symphony" as an outline of the ideal life and character. It is from the pen of Dr. Newell Dwight Hillis, and the thoughtful reader will regret that he so soon comes to the end of the little book. (1s. Oliphant, Anderson, & Ferrier.)

Mr. E. Kaufmann, 5 and 6, Paternoster Square, E.C., has issued three Scripture picture books, at the popular price of one penny. They are entitled, Old Testament Heroes, Parables and Miracles, and The Tender Shepherd. The accompanying letterpress is such as children will delight to read.

Noble Work by Noble Women, by Jennie Chappell, is a volume of sketches of the lives of Baroness Burdett-Coutts, Lady Henry Somerset, Miss Sarah Robinson, Mrs. Fawcett, and Mrs. Gladstone. Portraits and other illustrations add to the attractiveness of this deeply interesting book. (1s. 6d. Partridge).

London:
HODDER & STOUGHTON, 27, Paternoster Row, E.C.

A handy roll of "Thoughts for Each Day of the Month" has been issued by Partridge & Co., with the title Beautiful Days. The "thoughts" have been taken from the very instructive writings of Rev. J. R. Miller, D.D., and arranged by Adelaide L. J. Gosset. We trust the roll will be hung up in many a home. (1s.)

A series of devotional studies on the Lord's Prayer, by Dr. J. R. Miller, has been issued in a chaste little volume, entitled, The Golden Gate of Prayer. (3s. 6d. Hodder & Stoughton.) Though not cast in the form of expositions, the chapters present a practical explanation of the various petitions, and apply familiar expressions to the varied conditions of modern life.

The Journal of John Woolman needs no commendation. It is a pleasure to call attention to a new edition, at a popular price, issued by Headley Bros. Whittier's introduction is given, and there are interesting Appendices, including "A Word of Remembrance and Caution to the Rich." (Paper covers, 1s.; with illustrations, letters, bibliography, &c., 2s. 6d. nett.)

The Living Remnant: And other Quaker Tales, by K.K.K. (3s. 6d. Headley Brothers), is a charming little book. The "other tales" are: "Reuben Silcox's Wooing," "Reuben Silcox's Wedding," and "A Quaker's Apprentice." The pages give us glimpses of quaint customs that are passing, and of simplicity of life that will not so soon disappear from the Society of Friends.

Readers of the monthly periodical, Thoughts from the Word of God (1d. Wheeler, Paternoster Row), will find much for both mind and heart. The outlines and "Fragments," &c., are full of thought, and rich in suggestiveness, and help to render the monthly of real service to workers and students. This publication is deserving of a wide circulation.

To the "World's Wonder" series of books, dealing with present-day achievements in science, art, industry, etc., has been added The Lifeboat: Its History and Heroes. The invention, early history, and development of the lifeboat, combine to make an instructive and absorbing narrative, the value of which is enhanced by numerous illustrations and diagrams. (1s. 6d. Partridge.)

Life in an Open-Air Sanatorium, by Dr. Charles Reinhardt, physician in charge of the Hailey Open-Air Sanatorium, Wallingford, is a little book that is sure of readers at the present time. It gives a concise account of the modern treatment for consumption and other tuberculous diseases, and descriptions of the various open-air sanatoria in the British Isles. There are many illustrations. (1s. Bale, Sons, & Danielsson, 83 to 89, Great Titchfield Street, London, W.)

Two more Spurgeon volumes in the "Twelve Sermons" series have been issued by Messrs. Passmore & Alabaster: Repentance and The Christian Warfare. The pages contain specimens of the oldest as well as the latest work of the great preacher. Another publication, sure to be welcome to many readers, is C. H. Spurgeon Anecdotes. A hundred in number, the stories are full of interest. The pages are redolent of wisdom and mirth, and their contents will long be rehearsed in honour of their subject and original narrator. (1s. each.)

It would be difficult to conceive of a more suggestive collection of material for addresses to children than For the Lambs of the Flock: Seventy-five Short Sermons for Young People. By Rev. Charles Jerdan, M.A., LL.B. (5s. Oliphant, Anderson & Ferrier.) This is a line in which the author has worked for years, and there is not a dull page in his handsome book. Substance and style are admirably harmonized; and those who labour among the young will never turn to the book in vain, either for a good topic or a helpful line of treatment.

We have come to expect great things from Dr. R. P. Downes, and in his latest work, Woman: Her Charm and Power, our high expectations are fully realized. This is a book with a purpose—the ideal and the real are depicted, in the hope that those who read may advance to a nobler and more useful life. Dr. Downes is a graceful writer and a poet withal. Here he gives us not only his own thought, but the results of a wide reading in biography and poetic sentiment. Ample in range, and comprehensive in its treatment of a large subject, this is in every way an admirable book, and we trust it will have many readers. (3s. 6d., C. H. Kelly.)

My Counsellor is a book which is sure to be treasured in many Christian homes. It presents passages of Holy Scripture in the form of daily portions, designed to edify, guide, and comfort. Sometimes over a dozen excerpts are given in one day's reading; and they are so arranged as to emphasize or illustrate a particular aspect of truth, the source of the passages being indicated in the margin. This work is issued in various forms — Morning and Evening meditation separately (1s. each), or together in one volume (2s.); also the combined work may be had on thin India paper (2s. 6d. upwards). Then again a "Thumb" edition is published in two volumes, Morning and Evening, on India paper (1s. each upwards. Henry Frowde).

Valour and Victory is a marvellous collection of sketches of recent events in South Africa. The volume is in two parts "For England's Flag" and "For Queen and Empire," each with ten stories and an abundance of illustrations, many of them page-size, and some coloured. The writers are: Dr. Gordon Stables, R.N., E. A. Gillie, C. H. Lyall, Duncan McLaren, G. Stebbing, and Slade Chattan. Those who, during the winter months, would like to hear over again the stories of recent achievements, may have them read from this attractive book, which has an instructive as well as an entertaining quality. (Boards, 3s.; cloth, 5s. Shaw & Co.)

Mr. Henry Frowde has issued a revised translation of the well-known manual on The Imitation of Christ, by Thomas à Kempis. It is claimed for this edition that it is faithful to the Latin original, no word or phrase having been altered in the interests of any school or party. There are other distinctive features, including an enlarged index of subjects, and lists of quotations and references to Holy Scripture and other writings. The Christian Year, by John Keble, is bound in uniform style, the type being bold, and the exterior singularly chaste. This is a very desirable edition of a choice classic. (Ordinary paper, 1s. upwards; India paper, from 2s. each.)

Christianity and the Nineteenth Century is the title of the thirtieth Fernley Lecture, delivered at Burslem in July last. The lecturer was Dr. Charles Joseph Little, President of the Garrett Biblical Institute, Illinois, U.S.A. (2s. C. H. Kelly.) Here we have a study of conditions and prospects, rich in historical illustration and allusion. A perusal of these pages cannot but impress a thoughtful Christian with the greatness of the present opportunities of the Christian Church. Who shall say how much depends upon the urgency of the situation being duly recognised? Dr. Little's Lecture will occupy a position of honour among deliverances of great value by the most eminent representatives of the Methodist Church.

In The Children's King, Annie R. Butler, the author of "Stories from Genesis," retells the life of Jesus for young readers. As the preface sets forth, the special point of view of the sketch is that of "the promised King, who, coming in lowliness, and rejected of the Jews, will come again in glory as the desire of all nations." Care has been taken to present the story in words which the young can understand; and it is a pleasure to call attention to a book which is in so definite a way designed to instruct the rising generation in the things of God. There are many illustrations, also five coloured plates from pictures by J. J. Tissot. (2s. 6d. Religious Tract Society.)

Dr. George Matheson, of Edinburgh, is a charming writer for thoughtful Christians. His views are independent, and his style is unconventional. A year ago he gave us a volume entitled Studies of the Portrait of Christ, in which he endeavoured, to use his own words, "to trace the spiritual development, not of the life, but of the work of Jesus, exhibited in the Gospel narrative." Now we have Volume II. of the Studies, in which there are twenty-four chapters tracing the story up to Calvary. The method of the book imposed decided limitations upon the author, who is careful to explain in the preface that he would not minimize the Divine side by gathering up the impressions of the human. While unable to follow Dr. Matheson's interpretation in some instances, we have generally found his pages helpful in realizing the great portrait. The book is semi-devotional, and readers who are able to discriminate between the truths deduced from the narrative, and views read into the same by a writer of tenderness and power, will be richly rewarded by a perusal of the book. (6s. Hodder & Stoughton.)

The Bible School, conducted in England by Professor W. W. White, was a success in the highest sense; and in a large degree the fruitfulness of the movement was the result of the method employed. Those who attended the school will learn with pleasure that Professor White has compiled a book which will promote Bible study where his own voice cannot be heard. It is entitled Studies in Old Testament Characters and is a substantial volume of over 400 pages, with a series of diagrams such as the professor uses in his class demonstrations. The book is in two parts—first the studies, which are divided into daily sections, and aim at suggestion and direction, and not at biographical narrative or description. The teacher inflicts no addresses upon the student, but he endeavours to evoke independent inquiry and research in the entire range of Holy Scripture. The pages are devotional and practical, and many a helpful word is dropped by the way. The second part is an arrangement of portions of the Old Testament, covering the ground of the studies. The analytical character of this work cannot but prove of great service to such as intend to take up the course. The diagrams number 47, and are calculated to assist in digesting the contents of the Divine Library. We trust the work will do much to promote thorough Bible study. (Complete, 8s.: in two volumes, 5s. each. Marshall Bros.)

The Evangelical Position.

A SERIES of valuable works against Romanism in the Church of England is in course of publication by Nisbet & Co., under the general designation of "Church of England Handbooks." Edited by Rev. W. H. Griffith Thomas, M.A., and convenient in size as well as neat in get-up, these works (2s. each) are calculated to do good service to the Evangelical cause in these days of anxiety and confusion. The first, by Rev. A. R. Buckland, M.A., is entitled THE CONFESSIONAL IN THE ENGLISH CHURCH: Its Authority and its Influence. We know of no book so compact and comprehensive; and that the note is right may be gathered from a brief extract:—

HABITUAL CONFESSION.

The Confessor is called a physician, and Confession a medicine for the soul; but what healthy person wishes to visit his doctor once a week, or to dose himself regularly with medicine?

Habitual Confession encourages a morbid mental habit, the curious inquiry into sinful motions, the systematic contemplation of sinful thought and deed. To meditate upon evil, to tabulate (as Pusey says) "Quis, quid, ubi, quibus auxiliis, cur, quomodo, quando;" to scrutinize "the degree of sin," and to pry into the "purely interior will and desires" ("Pusey," p. 153), is at least to run a danger of encouraging the growth and vitality of the evil impulse.

Habitual Confession promotes unwarrantable and dangerous discrimination as to sins. Some, the penitent is taught, are mortal, some venial. Much must be made of one class, little of the other. The mind is led to regard the latter with comparative unconcern, and grievously to mislead itself, possibly to its own undoing.

Habitual Confession promotes a false sense of security. Absolution given, the sin is wiped out. "Go, and sin no more" is, no doubt, the message of the Confessional; but where pardon is so simple a transaction the message loses its force.

The second book of the series is THE DOCTRINE OF BAPTISM: Mechanical or Spiritual. By W. Hay M. H. Aitken, M.A. Here we have statements and arguments that are more clear and explicit than most treatments of the subject. In view of the formularies and practices of the Church of England, difficulties are encountered; but Mr. Aitken deals with them very ably. He is strong in contending for the spirituality of conversion. We make an extract which bears witness to his position and style of argument:

THE PLACE OF ORDINANCES.

It is perhaps a significant fact that the word Baptism is only used four times, or with the passage in Hebrews, where a different form is employed, five times in the Epistles; and the cognate verb is only used four times in connection with doctrinal teaching. Certainly this is not what we should expect, if faith and Baptism are co-ordinate conditions of regeneration. Surely we cannot altogether ignore the contrast between this slender reference to the ordinance of regeneration, and the repeated references to faith, as the condition of justification and salvation, which is characteristic, at any rate, of the Epistles of St. Paul. Such a discrepancy is clearly much more easily explained on the second than on the first of our hypotheses; for, if the object of the ordinance is to concentrate faith on a specific object, and to express it, when so concentrated, it is not surprising that much more should be said about the faith, that the ordinance is designed to assist, than of this provision for its assistance.

I cannot, indeed, forbear remarking that St. Paul must pose as a very bad Churchman, and an indifferent "Catholic," measured by the standard of those who rejoice in being strong Churchmen and good Catholics to-day. He wrote thirteen Epistles, and is sometimes credited with a fourteenth; but in these he only refers to Baptism by name in his doctrinal teaching some seven or eight times, and to the Eucharist he only refers in one Epistle out of the thirteen, and in that only incidentally in two short passages. How is this? Would any modern Ritualist be capable of such a procedure? Surely there must be some discrepancy between the estimate of the great Apostle, of the place of the sacraments in the Christian scheme, and that of some of those who profess to be guided by his teaching!

Messrs. Oliphant, Anderson & Ferrier announce a history of Livingstonia Mission, entitled DAYBREAK IN LIVINGSTONIA, by James W. Jack, M.A., revised with an introduction by Dr. Laws. An up-to-date map of Central Africa, with portraits of Dr. Livingston and Dr. Laws, and many other illustrations, are promised.

THE CHRISTIAN says:—"With the volume one has the familiar language of the A.V. side by side with all that the R.V. affords in precision and explanation. These features are secured without the bulkiness of a parallel edition; in fact, a thin-paper copy of this edition is hardly distinguishable in size or weight from such a copy of the A.V. or R.V. Bible by itself. For teachers and preachers this is a singularly useful book. It is likely to prove of great service to many who may hardly be able to buy for themselves, so that those who contemplate showing kindness to Christian workers may be glad to learn that the better bound copies are eminently suited for presentation purposes."

SUNDAY, November 25. Jeremiah xviii.

JEREMIAH strove in vain to arrest the headlong descent of king and court, priest and people, to destruction. But all his efforts seemed fruitless, and he fell into great discouragement of soul. Under these circumstances the Spirit of God led him to the potter's house, where he arrived in time to see the potter's ideal marred and hindered by the inability of the clay to take on his design. Instead of throwing it aside, the potter took the broken fragments of the clay, placed them on the wheel, and made as much of them as he could, not ideally the best, but the best possible.

God is ever waiting to do his best for us. Too often, alas, we thwart and hinder the Divine Workman, in the exercise of that free will which is the greatest prerogative of our nature. But He does not throw us utterly away. He cannot do what He would, so He will do what He can, and as soon as we show the least signs of repentance, He repents of the evil that He thought to do, and returns to us with copious blessing.

But ah! how greatly we have provoked Him! We have given up the fields watered from the hills for a barren rock, and renounced fountains which sprang at our side, for the stagnant contents of rock-hewn cisterns; we have forgotten Him, and burned incense to vanity. And when He has sent his prophets to us, we have rejected their admonition, and devised evil against them.

In hot anger, the prophet turned to God (19-23). How glad we need be that our God is longsuffering, slow to anger, and plenteous in mercy and truth. He has told us to forgive our brother until seventy times seven. Who, then, can estimate all the stars that shine in the milky way of his lovingkindness and tender mercy!

MONDAY, November 26. Jeremiah xix.

A very terrible stream of denunciation is here! The rarest, ripest fruit becomes most corrupt; the highest archangel, when he falls, becomes the prince of darkness; and because Jerusalem was capable of deserving to be called the Holy City, its fate, when God cast it aside as a disused earthen vessel, was the more terrible, so that whosoever heard, his ears would tingle.

Look at that broken vessel whose pieces were trodden into the soil of the Valley of Hinnom. It is full of the deepest significance for each of us. We were taken of common clay, and fashioned by the hand of God to be vessels unto honour, meet for the Master's use. We have passed through the kiln of suffering that we might never lose the impression of the Divine touch. But it may be that we have defeated our Father's plan by clinging to unholy habit, to worldliness, and self-indulgence. He has borne with us as long as He can. With unwearied long-suffering He has borne with us. Sometimes He has heaped up mercy, at other times has chastened us sore. But remember, O soul of man, that there is a limit to all this beyond which God will not go. Thou mayest provoke Him beyond all endurance, and then there will be nothing but rejection and undoing. The pieces of broken pottery strewing the Valley of Slaughter, which has become the synonym of hell in all after time, cry to us with a voice that speaks from every fragment, warning us to beware. Learn, therefore, in the power of the Holy Spirit, to die to the promptings of the flesh, and keep under your body, lest by any means you become a castaway.

The stocks were probably an instrument of torture in which the neck, hands, and feet of the prisoner were so fastened as to hold the body in a painfully distorted and constrained position; besides which, to be put in the stocks was to suffer great indignity, especially in so thronged a thoroughfare as the high gate of Benjamin. This incident was fraught with terrible results for its instigator. But what noble lyrics it elicited from the suffering prophet!

Jeremiah goes over the past. Could he have done otherwise than cry violence and spoil? The Divine Spirit in the early days of his call had left him no alternative. Even when he resolved to abandon the Divine service, and to speak no more in God's name, the inner fire gave him no rest. Day and night he was conscious that God was with him, as a mighty and terrible One. He seemed like a leaf borne on the impetuous wind, or a chip in the rush of the waterfall! Who of us, as we read these words, does not remember hours in the past, when they were literally true? Let us ask for God to renew those radiant days, when the difficulty was not to speak out, but to keep in, and we were conscious of the presence of the Lord God beside us.

This strain of meditation diverted the sufferer from his immediate grief. He forgot the stocks, and began singing of the deliverance from the hand of evil-doers, which the Lord had given to the soul of the poor. The Christian heart, infused by the power of the Holy Spirit, can sing, as did Paul and Silas in the darkness of the dungeon.

Then the frost settled on the spring of hope. The winter of discontent befel (vv. 14-18). Ah, me! How fickle are our frames! Well is it that we have access by faith to stand in the finished work of Jesus Christ!

WEDNESDAY, November 28. Jeremiah xxi.

During the siege, when the troops of Nebuchadnezzar were holding the city as in a vice, Zedekiah sent to ask whether the Lord would interpose on his behalf, so that the king of Babylon would be compelled to retire. High-handed rebels are amongst the first to cry out for mercy in the time of pressure, when they have no other resource.

The answer was decisive. There would be no respite, for God Himself was about to take the part of their foes, and fight against the beloved city with an outstretched hand. Nothing could avert the vengeance which was about to be inflicted by the Chaldeans, except submission to their demands: nothing could save the royal family from unquenchable fire, but the exercise of justice and judgment (11-14).

It was a remarkable alternative that the prophet presented. We should have thought that to go forth to the Chaldeans would have been to court instant destruction, when, on the contrary, it was life; we should have thought that to stay in the city would secure comparative immunity; but in that case, also, the reverse would happen. Is not this parallel with our Lord's constant affirmation, that those that seek their lives shall lose them, whilst those that lose shall find? If you have brought yourself into awful difficulty, and are hemmed in on every side, probably the way of deliverance and safety will be that which humbles your pride most absolutely in the dust, and sacrifices your high notions of your own wisdom. Take the lowest place, stoop to the very ground, humble yourself, that God may lift you up.

THURSDAY, November 29. Jeremiah xxii.

This chapter evidently belongs to an earlier portion of Jeremiah's life than those we have just considered. The people had not as yet set themselves to defy their Almighty Friend. High and low seemed still amenable to expostulation and appeal, and with good heart Jeremiah set himself to arrest the blight which was already stealing over the promise of Judah's best days. Soul! thou mayest resemble the city of Jerusalem. If only thou wilt do no wrong, but cleanse thyself from all filthiness of the flesh and spirit, thy King shall enter in by thy gates. But if not, though for beauty thou wast like Gilead, and for majestic height like Lebanon, yet thou shalt be desolate.

There had never been greater mourning in the land than for Josiah, the pious and patriotic king, who was slain in battle. In after years, Zechariah quoted "the mourning of Hadadrimmon, in the valley of Megiddon," as the symbol of unparalleled grief. And it seemed wonderful that God should take so good a man away in the pride of life. But here we learn (v. 10) that he was taken away from the evil to come. It may be that the tears we shed for our bereavement would be turned to thankful joy if we could only see how God, by taking our dear ones to Himself, had preserved them and us from irremediable sorrow. In comparison with Shallum, who was carried away captive to Egypt, never to return (2 Kings xxiii. 31-35), the death of Josiah was infinitely desirable.

As we read the prophet's words about Jehoiakim, the reigning prince, and Coniah, his son, we shudder as we remember that we too may be plucked as signets from God's right hand and become cast out. O, heart, heart, hear the word of the Lord (v. 29).

FRIDAY, November 30. Jeremiah xxiii.

Let us cull the sweet-smelling flowers of this chapter. God sets shepherds over his people, and his sheep shall neither fear nor be missing (v. 4). Jesus, our Lord, is as a branch into which we may be grafted (5). He is our King who shall save us and clothe us with his righteousness (6). Here, as in so many places, the kingship of our Lord precedes his Saviourship. Because He reigns we may dwell safely. Dost thou stand before God having thine own righteousness, or canst thou say that He is made unto thee . . . Righteousness?

A broken heart! Because of the sin of the false guides of the people. This is the true way of dealing with heresy. If we merely denounce the offender in hard and severe tones, we are not likely to lead him to a better mind. But the broken heart breaks hearts (9). The way of peace in which no evil comes, is only known to those who stand in the secret of the Lord, and have perceived and heard his Word. Let us stand in his counsel, then shall we cause the people to hear his Word, and we shall turn these from their evil way. What precious words are these for them that are called to minister in the Word of God (18, 22)!

God is everywhere present. Near at hand to listen to the blasphemy of those who deride thy religion. Near enough to be a very present help in thy time of trouble. His eyes behold the evil and the good; his Spirit fills heaven and earth, and the hearts of men (vv. 22, 23). God's Word is like a fire, let it smelt thee! It is like a hammer, let it pulverize thy pride (29)!

SATURDAY, December 1. Jeremiah xxiv.

Two baskets of figs were used to represent the different fates of the people at the fall of Jerusalem. The good figs in the one basket represented those who had been taken to Babylon. They had been sent out of their place into the land of the Chaldeans for their good (5). How often we are led into captivity for our good. With bitter regrets we turn our backs upon our early home, the scenes of youth, the faces we have loved. We are carried into a strange land, where we find it difficult to sing the song of the Lord. And then we become aware that there is a gracious purpose in the stern discipline, that God's eyes are upon us for good, and that He is giving us a heart to know Him. In the land of our captivity we turn to Him with our whole heart, and become his people, whilst God draws near to us, assuring us He will be ours for ever. Then begins restoration instead of exile; building up instead of pulling down, planting instead of plucking up.

Stay for a moment to ask if to you has been given the heart to know God; if you have profited by the lessons of your exile; if you have returned to Him who smote you? If this be so, you will be as the ripe figs of June, deemed a luxury by the Oriental, sweet to the taste of Him who searches beneath the leaves of profession.

There are some of us who congratulate ourselves that we have escaped the pain and suffering which have befallen others. Let all such remember that immunity from chastisement is not always the healthiest sign, and those who are not poured from vessel to vessel settle upon their lees. The residue of Jerusalem drifted to Egypt, and thence to all the kingdoms of the earth for their hurt. If I need it, do not forbear to chasten and reprove me, O my God!

Kew Gardens Academy.

OUR Academy is one of the largest in the world. We have scholars from every country under the sun. There are more varieties of size and colour to be seen in our school than, perhaps, in any other place. We have tall and short pupils, strong and delicate ones; there are those who always live in the nursery, and those, like myself, who remain out of doors day and night in all weathers.

Most of them in my class are English. My name is Poplar, and my playmates, Ash, Birch, Elm, Oak, Beech, and others call me "Lanky," because I am tall and thin. Nor am I so strong as my friend Oak. Yet, by bending gracefully, I withstand a fierce wind even better than he, although our masters say he is nearly twice as hard.

One day last summer it had been intensely hot. Not a breath stirred the unusual stillness. All creation seemed idle and exhausted, save for the quiverings and tremblings of young Aspen, a very nervous individual. He is always in a state of unaccountable agitation, even when all other things are restful. We nickname him "the Shiverer."

Towards evening we were grateful for a little breeze that sprang up to cool our burning cheeks. From the very top of my tall head I signalled the good news to the parched shrubs below me, as they turned their eyes to the blue sky in the hope of seeing a passing cloud. They were listless and weary, and could hardly show energy enough to wave back that they read my welcome message.

"We shall have rough weather to-night," grumbled stunted Master Yew, who for the last 400 years had withstood Time's advances, without growing perceptibly taller. "Aye, that we shall," assented the glossy Lime, also one of the senior scholars.

The breeze became boisterous and gusty. Suddenly it would rush madly from behind, and as suddenly pass away, only to repeat its capers more roughly the next moment. Gratitude at the change of temperature soon gave place to apprehension. Even the hardy Ash and the tough Elm were greatly concerned about it, while the Plane shed patches of bark in his fear.

"Nay," retorted the dark-skinned Fir, "if any of us go, it will likely be yon old tottering Willow, bent over as if he depended on his leaves to hold him up."

Said a sprightly Sycamore, standing bolt upright from his root, reminding one of a life-guardsman, "None of us knows, except, perhaps, Master Oak, whether it is his turn next. He has stood here for over 500 years, which leaves little room for our boasting." Master Oak was the monitor of our form, whom we all respected for his age and great strength. We regarded him as a sort of "Captain."

"Well said! Master Sycamore," returned the Oak, in a deep voice. "No one can tell his chances on a rough night like this, whether he be slim and weak, like my young friend Poplar here, or a sturdy old veteran, to whom a storm is almost as familiar as a sunrise. Our lives are in the Great Creator's hands."

At that instant our schoolmate Elm shed a huge arm, with a heavy thud to the ground. It was an irregular habit of his, even when there was no reason for fear.

For hours the storm raged. We were too occupied with its violence to notice our companions; save once, at a particularly brilliant flash, I heard a loud report, and saw one of them, I could not tell which, rift right in two, and his stately branches hurled to the ground. It was a solemn sight!

Early the next morning, the sun rose in a glorious blue sky, with only a fleck of cloud, here and there, high up in the heavens, as if storms and destruction were unknown. On, on came the sun, bringing light and heat, drying the rain-drops from our leaves and branches, and congratulating us on our freshened appearance.

There was one, however, whom no compliments could avail. Instead of my noble friend, the sturdy Oak, the pride of our school for his beauty and strength, stood a charred log, a cleft spar, a huge rent from top to toe, a great land wreck, a mass of dead timber and torn branches, soon to be the prey of myriads of vermin. Our master sent men with ropes and saws to sever the trunk, and that was the last we saw of the "king of the forest."

Never now do I heed boastful words, accompanied by unkind references to others in our school: when a storm threatens we all remember the rare humility and trustful words of the old Oak tree, "Our lives are in the Great Creator's hands."

Cheering Letters.

IT is a great joy to me (which I am sure my nephews and nieces and their parents will share) to hear of blessing resulting from our Young People's Page. I have received two letters this week about which I will tell you.

One is from a lady who sends me a letter to read which her little boy wrote to her from school. In it he tells of his Scripture classes and a test examination, in which he has been praised by his master, and he adds: "I find that the Bible Searcher has more than I thought for. . . . Please do not think I am boasting, but I thought you would like to know."

This is very encouraging, and I hope all my young friends will stick diligently to their searching, not only for prizes, but also for the knowledge it imparts.

The other letter is from a teacher connected with a chapel near London, who says:—

"Dear Uncle Tom,—I thought you would like to know that the Lord is using your paper, The Christian. I occasionally read the Young People's column at our Junior Christian Band. Last Thursday I read the piece, 'The Gipsy Boy.' On Sunday I received the following letter from a member (aged thirteen next January):—

"Dear Miss W.,—I know you will be glad to hear that I have found Christ and I have given my heart to Jesus. I thought that if a gipsy boy could give his heart to Jesus, when he had never heard of Jesus before, why shouldn't I give my heart to Jesus when I hear of Him every day? I am now one of God's children.'"

Will all who read this pray that this dear child will be kept "steadfast, unmovable," and "abound in the work of the Lord"? And I need hardly say how thankful I shall be to hear of other cases of blessing.

I have received a great number of letters from those who received prizes and certificates. I cannot refer to more than a few, but extracts from some of them appear below. I do not give these merely for the thanks or kind expressions they contain; but to show how much the Searching itself is appreciated. I hope that my young friends will all try to secure new readers for next year.

"I have great pleasure in doing the 'Bible Searcher' every week, and I have derived great good from doing it."

"Thank you very much for such a nice prize. I have never had the 'Pilgrim's Progress' before. I have got now five prizes and three certificates."

"Thank you very much for the nice prize. I like reading about missionaries more than anything else, and I am sure I shall be interested in the book you sent me."

"Thank you very much for the certificate. It was so pretty; father is going to get me a frame for it. I shall hang it up in my room. I hope next time to get a prize."

"I thank you very much for the pretty book you sent me for a prize. Father says it is the nicest and most useful book I have yet got, and I am sure I shall enjoy reading it."

"I am writing to thank you for my nice prize. Perhaps it would interest you to know that I got a beautiful Reference Bible as the first prize for Scripture in the County School Competitions."

"I thank you very much for the nice book. The Christian that we get each week goes to a friend, in whose house they like it very much, and then he sends it out again, so that it is circulated very much."

"After we have finished with The Christian, which we enjoy reading, Father gives it to a friend, in whose home it is much appreciated; from there it goes to other friends, who likewise appreciate it."

"Thank you very much for the beautiful prize. I keep my prizes in a bookcase of my own when I have read them, and soon I shall have quite a nice collection(if I get any more). We all enjoy the competition very much, and hope to keep it up till we are too old."

"Thank you so much for my prize. It is such a nice book; I am delighted with it and value it very much. This is the first time I ever tried a competition. The Prize Questions were very difficult, but I resolved to do my best. I enjoy doing the weekly questions very much."

"Thank you very much for the certificate. I like it very much, and think it is very pretty, and so do my teachers and schoolfellows. I like doing the 'Searchers' very much, and I often find things which I did not know were in the Bible, when searching for texts."

"Thank you for my certificate; it is so pretty. Mother is very pleased (and father too) for what I've got. I must have it framed. I so much enjoy looking up the 'Bible Searcher,' and I think it is very kind of you to look after it all, and us young people."

"Thank you very much for the certificate you have sent me. It is very pretty, and I like it very much. You are very kind in taking so much trouble with us. I love searching the Scriptures, and I try to think of it during the week. It is so nice to think of God and his Word."

"I was very glad to receive the certificate. I cannot thank you enough. I am very pleased indeed to have it. I looked for it every post, and what a large one it was. It was very kind of you indeed to take so much time with the children. It must tire you and your helpers to see that the papers are correct, and such a lot too."

"Thank you very, very much indeed, for the beautiful prize. I have shown it to a few friends, who think it a prize well worth having. I am very fond of reading, and as my books are gradually accumulating, my father has put some bookshelves in my room, and they look very nice. I do enjoy doing the "Searcher," and it has helped me to learn more about the Bible. I certainly know a great deal more about the book of Jeremiah than I did before."

A few of my nephews and nieces say they are dropping the Searcher this quarter on account of their lessons, or other Scripture work. But I am glad to note that they all hope to begin it again when the pressure is over.

I do not want the Bible Searching ever to become a burden. It is better to take a rest, and begin again with fresh interest, than to continue it after it ceases to be a pleasure.

Uncle Tom.

Christian Endeavour Topic.

SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 25.

Praise the Lord.—Psa. cxlvii. 1-20.

IT is a comely and befitting thing for us to blend praise and prayer. There is a difference between praise and thanksgiving—we thank God for what He has done for us, we praise Him for what He is in Himself. In praise we come nearest the worship of heaven, where the angels and the redeemed find the loftiest exercise of their faculties in ascribing praise, and honour, and glory to God.

One of the noblest expressions of praise ever indicted by merely human lips is the Te Deum; and in my private devotions I find nothing more helpful and soul-stirring than to recite that noble poem before asking for any gift at the hand of God. It seems to put Him in his right place, and to abase the soul before Him in the attitude of adoration and praise, which is very becoming. "It is good to sing praises, and praise is comely."

I. Let us Praise his Condescending Love (1-6).—He counts the number of the stars as a shepherd tells his sheep (4). The Psalmist likens the constellations to a flock of sheep, which their shepherd is driving through space. What a sublime conception of suns, comets, planets, and asteroids! Yet this wonderful and infinite God can bend over our little lives, and take special notice of outcasts, the broken-hearted, the sorely wounded, and the meek. None are too small and insignificant for his notice. Just as a mother is most careful and thoughtful for the smallest, stupidest, and most ailing child in her family, so God's tenderest, strongest, and most efficient help is displayed towards the neediest and most helpless of his children. He always seeks the lost sheep, the lost money-piece, the prodigal child.

Is this not matter of Praise? Ah, you may not realize it to be so, until you are broken-hearted, and wounded, stript by thieves, and ready to die, and find Him to be a very present help. Then you will get the best thought of God's wonderful nature, and be filled with the most adoring Praise.

II. Let us Praise his Work in Providence. (7-9 and 16-18).—Notice those present tenses. The Psalmist did not suppose that God had wound up the world like a clock, and had gone away, leaving it to take its chance. He felt that God was always working in nature, that every shower, every fall of snow, every frost, every rill gushing from the mountain side was due to the direct action of his Providence. And Jesus confirmed it when He said that no sparrow fell to the ground without the Father. The pure in heart, the child-like, and the meek, have this prerogative of seeing God's hand in all things. God is; God is everywhere; God is everywhere active and energetic; and therefore there is no point of space, and no moment of time, in which He does not operate. "Worthy art Thou, our Lord and our God . . . for Thou didst create all things. "Of Him, and through Him, and to Him are all things, to Him be the glory."

II. Let us Praise Him for his Work in his Church (10-15 and 19, 20).—In a deeper sense than the Psalmist may have intended, God hath made peace (14). "He made peace by the blood of his cross." We praise God for his work in creation, but above all for the redemption of the world, through our Lord Jesus Christ, for the means of grace, and for the hope of glory. Whether we think of his Word that runs very swiftly, or of the wheat of the Bread of Life, or of the wind of the Holy Spirit—what can we do but praise Him for placing such resources within our reach? F.B.M.

Let us show forth our praise, not only by our lips, but in our lives, by giving up ourselves to his service, and by walking before Him in holiness and righteousness all our days. Each should ponder in this connection Heb. xiii. 15.

C.E. NOTES.

A united Rally and Convention have been held in the Isle of Man of the sixteen Societies in the Manx Union. It was a most inspiring time, and proved that Christian Endeavour in the island is a growing force for God and good.

At the sixth anniversary meeting of the Guildford Baptist Society, the secretary reported that, during the past year, the Evangelistic Committee had conducted no fewer than sixty evangelistic services, indoors and out, in cottages and their own churches, besides holding a mission in a neighbouring village, and conducting special services in their own church every month.

International S.S. Lesson.

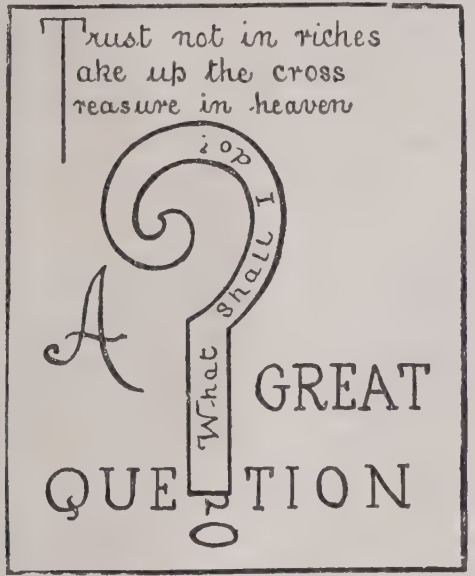
December 2, 1900.

The Rich Young Ruler (Matt. xix. 16-26).

Golden Text: "Children, how hard it is for them that trust in riches to enter into the kingdom of God" (Mark x. 24).

Introduction.

THIS ruler was rich and young and of good position; he was in real earnest (Mark x. 17), and very lovable, "Jesus beholding him loved him" (Mark x. 21).



Key to Blackboard Plan.—It was a momentous question Eternal life was in it, and Christ gives this young man an an answer in three parts, "Trust not in riches," "Take up the cross," "Thou shalt have treasure in heaven." His great stumbling-block was his riches.

1. Seeking Something.

(16) Seeking for heaven, for life everlasting, for future happiness. Notice his two questions (16), "What shall I do?" (20) "What lack I?" He was very anxious about this eternal life. Let us see what it means to us. Are we as anxious? Is it a mighty question to us? (Rom. vi. 23; Titus iii. 5-7; 1 John v. 11-13, 20.)

2. Finding it.

(18, 19) Christ brings to mind all the commandments, and leads the young man through them, and out beyond them, till he asks (20) "all kept, what more?"

(21) "Perfection means one thing more," answers the Master. "If you would have eternal life, you must follow Me." Eternal life you may have; it is a free gift to everyone that believeth; but there is a condition attached, and that condition is "full consecration." That which is his must be no longer his; it belongs to God; it cannot be used solely for the young man's own pleasure, "Sell, give;" it will be a cross; but "take up the cross and come follow Me" (Mark x. 21). Oh! what a large condition it seemed—and yet Jesus bore a heavier cross for us than we shall ever be asked to bear for Him.

3. What it Cost.

(Luke xviii. 23), "very sorrowful," "very rich," (Mark x. 22), "grieved," great possessions; see also (1 Tim. vi. 9-10; James v. 1-3; Matt. xiii. 22). The Golden Text gives exactly the right meaning; it is the "trusting" in riches, that is wrong, and this was the young ruler's weak point (21, 22). His riches were more to him than treasure in heaven (Matt. vi. 20, 21).

Jesus loved him, but he did not return the love; how often we too forget that great love; do we respond? Saddest of all, he turned his back on Jesus, and went away (22). (John vi. 68; Prov. xi. 28; xxx. 8, 9).

It seems as if Matt. xiii. 44-46, settled it all. It was the one little word "all." In both these parables "sold all" is told us (Luke x. 42; Phil. iii. 13).

"Follow Me" means (John xii. 26) "Believing in Jesus."

Then let us each one take up our cross, whatever it is (and God will show us), and follow Him (Mark i. 18, 20; Luke v. 27, 28; Acts viii. 39). What a contrast. "Went on his way rejoicing."

Noon Prayer Meeting.

MR. W. R. MOODY was heartily received, both for his honoured father's sake and his own, at the Noon Prayer Meeting at Aldersgate Street on Monday last. Mr. R. C. Morgan presided. The subject of Mr. Moody's brief but suggestive address was, the wise men and their gifts (Matt. ii.). Mr. Moody said that, wise and learned as these men undoubtedly were in earthly things, they showed a deeper, holier wisdom in that, seeing his Star, they followed it.

Proceeding, Mr. Moody spoke briefly on the three gifts—gold, frankincense and myrrh, giving to each a symbolical meaning. Gold has been for six years the cause of strife in the United States, in the contest for the "Gold Standard." There is a i.e., giving our best to God, remembering that He gives best who, as the widow with her mite, gives all. Frankincense may be taken to represent consecration, for there is a peculiar fragrance about the life of those whose affections are set upon Divine things, whose daily life is one of practical service. In this connection Mr. Moody spoke of a little girl in one of the crowded tenements of an American city. She ceased to attend Sunday school, and was visited by her teacher, who found her dying of consumption. The child had been left, by her mother's death, to attend to all the home affairs, and she said to the teacher, "I got the others off to school, but I couldn't go myself. I've done so little for Jesus I don't know what I can say to Him." The child's hands were distorted and wrinkled with hard toil, and so the teacher replied, "You need say nothing to Him; just show Him your hands."

Myrrh, of all things most bitter, but from which grateful odours issue when it is consumed by fire, was compared to the sorrows of life which, if hidden in the heart, only cause bitterness, but, offered on God's altar, are burned by the

and give forth a beautiful spiritual fragrance. Mr. Moody illustrated the point happily by a story of a lady who was left a widow. Resisting the temptation to nurse her grief, she sought that her bereavement should be sanctified to the blessing of others. She accordingly commenced a ministry of solace and comfort to those who had been similarly deprived, obtaining their names from the obituary columns of newspapers. Mr. Moody closed with an earnest application of these thoughts to the daily lives of his hearers, and prayed that they might all be "God's wise men."

A number of interesting testimonies followed. Rev. Henry Montgomery, of Belfast, and his daughter, who is sailing this week to take up her missionary work in Gujarat, spoke briefly, and Mr. Noble, for nine years congregational missionary with Dr. Andrew Bonar, gave a forcible description of the who, convinced of sin as a result of open-air services, used to lock his doors when the indoor meeting began, and go down into his cellar, which extended beneath the mission-room. There, where he could hear the the proceedings, he joined in the singing. He subsequently became a new creature in Christ Jesus, and an esteemed Christian worker.

W. R. MOODY,

IS NOW READY.

Price, FIVE SHILLINGS.

It contains 576 pages, Large 8vo, including over Eighty Illustrations.

Mr. W. R. MOODY, in the Preface, says:—

"The preparation of my father's biography has been undertaken as a sacred trust. Early in the spring of 1894 he was asked by an old friend for permission to issue a biography with his approval. This my father declined to do, and on that occasion expressed the wish that I should assume the task when his life work was ended."

"What I want,"

Mr. D. L. MOODY SAID TO HIS SON,

"is that you should correct inaccuracies and misstatements that it would be difficult to straighten out during my life. You are the one to do this. All my friends will unite with you and give you their assistance."

Mr. W. R. MOODY, referring to the short time in which the "Life" has been written, says:—

"It would have been my choice to have had more leisure for accomplishing the work; but the announcement of unauthorised biographies has necessitated the immediate publication of the present volume, otherwise the desire of my father would have been thwarted."

OFFICE OF "THE CHRISTIAN,"

And may be ordered of any Bookseller.

Rev. G. Campbell Morgan.

Rev. G. CAMPBELL MORGAN, pastor of New Court Chapel, Tollington Park, N., has accepted a very urgent invitation from friends of the Northfield Schools, to undertake work in connection with an extension movement in America. This movement, which is called the Northfield Extension Work, has for its object the holding of special conventions, more particularly for ministers and Christian workers, in the cities and towns of the United States. During the later years of his life, Mr. D. L. Moody was greatly impressed with the necessity of evangelizing the world through the Church; and our readers are aware that Revs. F. B. Meyer and G. Campbell Morgan during recent years have conducted such gatherings in America in the summer months.

Mr. Campbell Morgan will now devote himself entirely to this work, with the exception, perhaps, of a few weeks in the summer, when he may give attention to the students at Northfield. In accepting the call, brought to this country by Mr. Moody's son, Mr. W. R. Moody, Mr. Campbell Morgan says:—"I feel that a very great honour is conferred upon me in that I am given the privilege of sharing, in any measure, in carrying on the work which lay so near the heart of your beloved father and my valued friend. My confidence of success is based upon no sense of my own fitness for the work, but upon the sufficiency of the God who marks out the path of service."

Mr. Morgan's intention to resign his present charge and accept the American invitation was announced at New Court on Sunday last. Very great regret is felt that he is leaving North London, where the influence of his personality has been strongly marked. He himself says: "I have long felt that God was preparing me for a ministry to the churches rather than to one particular church, and now the door stands open for such work. It has not opened where I thought and hoped it would—in my own country."

We bespeak for Mr. Morgan, and his new field of labour, the earnest prayers of our readers. May his work in America be greatly blessed, and may England in turn share the blessing that God shall give upon his endeavours.

The Salvation Army.

THE anniversary of the Women's Social Work of the Salvation Army was celebrated on Monday of last week, at the Holborn Restaurant. Sir Horace Tozer, Agent-General for Queensland, presided.

In the course of an address, descriptive of the year's operations, Mrs. Bramwell Booth said that the Army has, in various parts of the world, no fewer than 125 homes for women, through which 5,000 friendless and needy persons are passed during a year. In this country the Homes number forty-six, with 2,000 women under the Army's care. In the space of four years the accommodation has doubled, but there is still an urgent need for more. In the course of an appeal for workers, the speaker said that, although the work is growing rapidly, it can only grow so fast as fresh workers come forth, for no amount of money, no number of suitable buildings, can accomplish the task that has been undertaken unless they are accompanied by kind, sympathetic, and consecrated hearts. Mrs. Booth went on to describe the maternity branch and other departments of the work, and made an earnest appeal for financial support.

Other speakers during the evening were—Sir Algernon West, who voiced the sympathy of the London County Council; Rev. H. R. Haweis, who rejoiced in the sympathetic spirit of the workers; and Rev. Charles Spurgeon, who spoke in appreciative terms of the union of spiritual and social work in the Army.

Gibraltar.—Mr. Geo. Holmes, who has laboured at Gibraltar for ten years, chiefly among the troops stationed there and those passing through on their way to other stations, appeals for supplies of Gospel literature. His address is, Mision Evangelica, Gibraltar.

Jews in Whitechapel.

THE problem that confronts the Barbican Mission to the Jews at the present time is the deficiency of some £2,500 on the cost of the outlay for its new home. The committee hope that the few weeks which must of necessity elapse before the builders retire from the scene and the workers take possession, anxiety in this respect will be removed, and no lack of support will intervene to hinder the realization of the hopes entertained regarding the project.

As President of the Mission, Prebendary Webb-Peploe has issued a special appeal for funds to enable the committee to complete their task. Having recalled the steps which led up to this effort, he says: "The lease of the Mission House in Finsbury Square expired in September, 1898. The Committee took temporary premises in Commercial Road—the very centre of the Jewish quarter in East London—and there the work is still carried on with many tokens of the good hand of our God upon us. But believing that the Lord is bidding us go forward in this work, the Committee are anxious to see the Mission established in

A HOUSE OF ITS OWN.

"The Committee felt that no better memorial of the life and work of their first President could well be devised than the erection of Mission Buildings, which would serve to advance the cause Prebendary Gordon Calthrop had so much at heart, the evangelization of Israel.

"We are most anxious that no time should be lost in completing the buildings. Now we have got thus far, it would be a grievous pity if, for lack of means, we have to order the builder to stay his hand. Such a step would be most calamitous, and could not but hinder us in the more directly evangelistic and spiritual work of the Mission.

"The distinctive feature of the Mission is, that its spiritual direction shall be in the hands of a Hebrew Christian, and that as far as possible all the other workers shall also be Hebrew Christians. The business arrangements are under the direct control of the President and Committee, who also exercise careful supervision over the whole work.

"Who will help us to finish the buildings, and so set us free to give greater attention to the work of proclaiming the glorious Gospel of the Grace of God to the teeming thousands of Jews in our midst?"

It will be remembered that the foundation-stone of the new premises was laid some four months ago by Mrs. Gordon Calthrop, widow of the first President of the Mission. Since then the walls of the building have been steadily rising, and the scheme is rapidly nearing completion. Suitable accommodation will be provided for Bible classes, reading room, and what is of great importance, a converts' and inquirers' home. At the rear of the mission house is the chapel, with capacity for at least three hundred, for the maintenance of Gospel services.

The director is Mr. C. T. Lipshytz, who may be addressed at Vine House, Walthamstow, E.

"Out and Out" Conference.—The annual "Out and Out" Conference for Christian Young Men was held in the Y.W.C.A., Bridge Street, Manchester, on Saturday, November 10. The meetings were largely attended by young men from various towns and districts around Manchester. Earnest addresses were delivered by Messrs. R. G. Pringle (Bombay), J. G. Logan (Egypt), John Bennett, and W. W. Cash.

Temperance Sunday.—Mr. Charles Pinhorn writes:—"Sunday, November 25, having been appointed to be observed as Temperance Sunday, the committee of the London United Temperance Council venture to urge that it shall be observed by (a) Early morning prayer meeting; (b) Special sermons; (c) Addresses at Sunday-schools, P.S.A. meetings, &c., &c., at each place of worship, as a preliminary to the Pledge Signing Mission to be held during the following year." Particular interest will centre in Temperance Sunday, inasmuch as the day will mark the commencement of the Million Pledges Crusade, in which the Free Churches are heartily uniting. The effort is to be conducted upon strictly Gospel Temperance lines. Pocket pledge books and forms have been issued, and there is every prospect of this great movement being successfully inaugurated.

Some Special Offers in Books.

THE problem with many grown-ups will soon be, what books shall I buy for children's presents? An answer may be found in the special parcel which Messrs. Morgan & Scott offer for 10s., carriage paid. It contains seven volumes of Rev. E. Payson Hammond's works; a book by A.L.O.E., entitled Percival's Picture Gallery; a tale by Mrs. Hunter, entitled Joe Witless; and the six volumes of "Nettie's Mission" Library; in all fifteen volumes for 10s., as stated above (or 11s. 9d. if for abroad).

Another special offer, which will appeal to preachers, teachers, and all students of the Scriptures, is the 6s. parcel of Biblical works. This includes a copy of Cruden's Concordance (3s. 6d.); a handbook to the Old and New Testament, entitled The Bible Remembrancer (2s. 6d.); The Bible Interpreter, an illustrated dictionary of the Scriptures (1s. 6d.); and two other valuable works: Searching the Scriptures (2s. 6d.), by Dr. J. Anderson, and Christ Lifted Up (2s. 6d.), by Rev. R. Gilchrist. These five books, it will be noted, total up to 12s. 6d.; but the publishers offer the parcel, carriage free, for 6s. (or if for abroad, 8s.).

Yet another special offer, which is of special appropriateness at this time, when so many are being turned aside to the errors of Romanism, is the parcel of Protestant books for 9s., carriage paid, including a splendid edition of Foxe's Book of Martyrs, with twelve full-page illustrations, and a steel-plate frontispiece. This book alone is published at 10s. 6d. Then there is a copy of The Catacombs at Rome, by Mr. Benjamin Scott, F.R.A.S.; two of Miss Richardson's books, giving practical experience of Romanism; a small book by General Dunne, dealing with Papal Infallibility; and fifty-four copies of a pamphlet on The Confessional, by Miss Richardson. This latter will be found very useful for distribution. The whole parcel of volumes and pamphlets is offered for 9s., carriage paid (or 11s. 3d. if for abroad).

The publishers, however, make one condition with all these "special offers"—it is that those ordering same will undertake to carefully place the copies of The Christian (which will be enclosed in each parcel) with some friends not as yet acquainted with the paper, in the hope that they may be induced to become regular subscribers. All orders for these special parcels of Books should be sent, with remittance, to Morgan & Scott, Office of The Christian, Paternoster Bldgs., E.C. [Advt.

Singing the Gospel.

THE place of song in evangelistic work is very different now to what it was twenty-five or thirty years ago, and the great popularity of Sacred Songs and Solos is evidenced by the crowds which flock to hear Mr. Sankey on his present visit to this country; and during all the years since the book was first introduced, its influence has been continually growing, until to-day it is used in every religious denomination, including the Church of England, and "the music of the Gospel" has by its means been spread far and wide. On another page (25) a list is given of superior bindings suitable for presentation, but cheaper editions can be had. There are over forty editions of the "750" book, ranging from 1d. upwards. Full list of prices, with specimens of type, etc., can be obtained post free from Messrs. Morgan and Scott, Office of The Christian, 12, Paternoster Buildings, E.C. [Advt.

Evangelistic.

MRS. BAEYERTZ'S visit to Ancrum has awakened intense interest throughout the district. In spite of the very wet weather people have driven long distances in the rain to hear her. Others walked ten miles, and expressed themselves as more than repaid for their trouble. The afternoon Bible-readings were helpful and delightful, and the evening meetings solemn, heart-searching, and instructive. Christians were made to realize what a much higher level can be attained in the divine life, when they walk with God, and delight in Him, and when their consecration to Him is so thorough as to lead them to give up all doubtful things, and to abstain from the very appearance of evil. It may be mentioned that both the clergymen in the parish attended the meetings regularly, and gave their countenance and help.

Mrs. Baeyertz has a remarkable personality, and a wonderful way of opening up the Scriptures. She is most earnest and persuasive in her appeals both to the Christians and to the unconverted. Will her many friends pray that she may be strengthened during the ten days' rest at Helensburgh, for her Glasgow Mission?

Tent Mission in Dublin.

Five months ago Mr. DAVID REA, of Belfast, pitched his large circus-shaped tent at the corner of Tara Street, Dublin, in the heart of the city, and has continued to hold meetings twice daily with crowded attendances and much blessing. The mission has just been concluded. The tent will accommodate 2,500, and at a push, 3,000 persons. On Sundays it was invariably filled, and there were very large meetings every week-day. All classes and conditions of society were represented; the people coming from the city and suburbs, and in not a few cases quite long distances from the country.

Upon several occasions there was deep anxiety expressed on the part of young people concerning their spiritual welfare; at one meeting quite a number pushing their way to the front to be spoken with by the preacher.

Hundreds of Roman Catholics have listened to the Gospel and to the exposure of the Romish system. Some of the most remarkable cases of decision have been those of Roman Catholics, who have stood up boldly before the people and confessed Christ as their Saviour and Lord. The work has been of a strictly unsectarian nature. Mr. Rea and his helpers, together with Mr. James Sprunt, of London, who has been helping by preaching and singing during the past month, have had only one aim, and that the awakening and conversion of sinners. S.

Rev. Henry Montgomery in London.

The eight days' mission which Rev. HENRY MONTGOMERY, M.A., of Belfast, has been holding in Camden Road Presbyterian Church (Rev. Dr. Thornton's) came to a close on Monday last. Four impressive Bible readings were given during the week which were largely attended, but the evening meetings were the chief feature of the mission. About 300 were present each week night, while on the Sabbath evenings chairs were placed in the aisles and around the pulpit. Mr. Montgomery found the people in a very responsive mood, and at his first call fifty-two young men went into the hall for a special address, while 120 young women assembled in another room. Night by night these separate gatherings of young people waited for prayer and personal dealing. Two meetings for senior scholars were also held, and several of the older boys and girls gave their hearts to Christ. The mission was, in fact, a young people's mission, and yet many of the older people were greatly refreshed, careless ones aroused, and a gracious atmosphere of love diffused over all classes. The mission preacher does not mind working "overtime" in soul-winning work, and his enthusiasm proved contagious. Miss LUCY MONTGOMERY gave at each service a Gospel message in song, which was much appreciated. It is impossible at this early date to say what will be the fruits of this mission, but there can be no doubt that Camden Road Church has enjoyed a rare season of spiritual privilege.

Mr. W. R. Lane in Carlisle.

Mr. W. R. LANE has just completed a ten days' mission at Carlisle in connection with the Free Church Council. Throughout the weather was highly unpropitious, yet it seemed to have no effect, so far as keeping down the audiences was concerned. The Drill Hall, the largest building in Carlisle, and one of the most uncomfortable, was utilized, and night after night crowds were drawn together to listen to powerful expositions of Gospel truth. The ways of life and death were pointed out with much faithfulness, and the Spirit of God worked with gracious power. Not a few became anxious inquirers, and were handed over to the ministers of the several churches for further instruction and guidance. Several Bible readings were given in the afternoons in the Fisher Street Wesleyan Church, where the attendance also was large and the interest great. Mr. Lane's lecture on John Bunyan and the Pilgrim's Progress drew a crowded house, and the pictorial representations given by lime-light, lent themselves well to illustrate the passage of the sinner from the city of destruction to the Celestial City. From long knowledge of Carlisle, we are prepared to say with deliberation that we have never known more interest to be taken in any mission. The ministers of the several churches supported Mr. Lane right loyally, and their congregations were responsive in a high degree. Mr. Lane deals with marrow truths, and his expositions are so many sided, simple, and lucid that he who runs may read. The Council has been greatly indebted to Mr. W. B. Redmayne, the secretary, for the trouble he has taken to make the mission run smoothly, and to Mr. Robert Nicholson, who has led a large choir in the service of song. We believe the bread cast on the waters will be found after many days. J. CHRISTIE.

A fruitful month's mission has been held at the Great Assembly Hall, Mile End, by Rev. JOHN T. VINE, who has now decided not to return to America, where he has for the last twenty years been evangelizing in the various churches of the United States. His visits to the Assembly Hall are looked forward to with pleasure, as his preaching has always been blessed. At the large Sunday gatherings, many responded to the invitation to decide for Christ, and the inquiry room was well filled with the anxious.

At Mr. TENNYSON SMITH'S meeting in Tynewydd and Nantymoel the chapels were crowded, and some hundreds were unable to obtain admission at the evening services. Many persons, both adults and young people, signed the temperance pledge.—Services have been held at Worcester Park, Surrey, by Mr. WILLIAM COLLARD. Mr. F. Lewis Baldwin, superintendent of the Mission Hall, writes: "Many were wrought upon by the Spirit of God, and sought the Saviour."—Referring to Mr. William Day's mission at Winchester, the evangelist wishes to make it clear that he desired, in a recent report, to speak of slaves of sin and not slaves of drink.

Following a ten days' Gospel Mission by Mr. HENRY THORNE at Dursley, the evangelist held a mission at Hay. A correspondent writes:—"The unity and expectancy of the ministers and committee were encouraging. Christians have been greatly helped." The unconverted were deeply impressed. Later Mr. Thorne conducted services at the Congregational Church, Godalming. Among those who were brought to the Lord were many young people from the Sunday-school. The Bible readings held in the afternoons were very helpful.

Mr. CHARLES E. BARRACLOUGH has conducted a seven days' mission at the Field Lane Institutions. On the Sunday morning over 500 tramps gathered to listen, as the "old, old story" was once more told forth. The Monday saw 200 women assembled in the afternoon. This meeting was for women only, and the attendance was very encouraging considering that the C.I.V. procession was passing at the time so close to the institution. Blessing has followed the preaching of the Word. Backsliders have returned, and some decisions for Christ have been made.

S. S. SHRUBSOLE.

The visit of Mr. JOSIAH NIX to Otley had long been anticipated, and it resulted in much blessing. On two important questions there is no uncertain sound in the preaching of Mr. Nix, the necessity of conversion and the importance of total abstinence being strongly set forth. At the close it was found that upwards of 150, young and old, had sought the Saviour, and between 200 and 300 had signed the temperance pledge. Many followers of Jesus found the more abundant life in Christ Jesus, in the afternoon Bible Readings and the Sunday morning services.

Mr. GERALD COULTAS has visited Swansea. He writes:—"From the lips of Pastor and Mrs. Snelling I heard of God's gracious care of them, and of the great work with which they are associated." For many years these servants of the Lord have borne a bright testimony for Him. Large congregations came together in the Albert Hall. The other branches of the mission are also prospering.—Rev. T. Napoleon Smith writes:—"The ten days' mission at the Grafton Square Tabernacle, conducted by Rev. JOHN MITCHELL, will be long remembered with thankfulness. Mr. Mitchell's earnest proclamation of the Gospel was made additionally effective by the use of his splendid mechanical diagrams, of which he has produced so great a variety. The children were deeply impressed, and it is believed that some of tender age intelligently accepted the Saviour."

Notes & Comments

IT is very gratifying to find the earnestness with which the Two-Version Bible scheme (see p. 9) is being taken up. Already several readers have become entitled to this handsome book, and write expressing their great satisfaction with it. Our publishers hope to add many more to the list.

A correspondent makes the following suggestion, which we shall be glad to see our readers adopt:—

I am much gratified to find that in several refreshment houses in the City, a copy of your valuable paper (The Christian) is laid upon the tables. And who can tell the happy results that may follow from the many who read its contents? May I suggest that more of your readers follow this worthy example? I think every reader might help to make The Christian more widely known, for one grieves to see how few sound Christian papers there are abroad in the present age, and how much trash of a most demoralizing nature. Is it not time for Christians to arouse themselves, and seek to do all that lies in their power to counteract this terrible curse of evil literature?

Lord Rosebery's stirring speech at the Glasgow University on "Questions of the Empire" was remarkable for many striking features, but especially for the frank acknowledgment made by him of the finger of God in the course of history that went to the training of the nation for its world-wide tasks.

Growing as trees grow, while others slept; fed by the faults of others as well as by the character of our fathers; reaching with the ripple of a resistless tide over tracts and islands and continents, until our little Britain woke up to find herself the foster-mother of nations and the source of united Empires. Do we not hail in this less the energy and fortune of a race than the supreme direction of the Almighty? Shall we not, while we adore the blessing, acknowledge the responsibility?

This note has been only too rare in the political orations of the present generation. It is symptomatic of the prevalent temper of the times, however, that even this lofty note has jarred on the sensibilities of some of our journalists, who have insinuated a drop of their cynic poison into their adulatory references to the speech. Nevertheless, it has found a sympathetic response in the hearts of millions of Britain's loyal citizens.

We wish that all our young men could be induced to read and to re-read his lordship's pointed utterances upon the question of real manhood as it is related to a nation's weal:—

The first need of our country is a want of men. The supply of first-rate men is never excessive. . . . The difficulty is to find them. How do we stand with regard to those healthy, hardy, frugal virtues which mean so much to a people? Whether an insidious and excessive luxury is not prevalent among us; whether the passion for wealth, its influence, and the worship it receives be not a danger; whether, indeed, our land is not becoming the playground of the plutocrats of all nations—these are grave questions, with which we are confronted.

John Burns' recent utterance to a meeting of working men, that nothing but a revival of the old Puritan spirit could save England to-day, has been much quoted by religious speakers. Perhaps Mr. Burns, in giving voice to an unquestionable truth, hardly measured the full meaning of his words. The Puritan spirit was the spirit of unbounded faith in the Divine government of the world, and of wholehearted service to God as the Ruler of men. Apart from these profound principles, their strength was weakness. Nothing therefore but a revival of their religious faith can renew the spirit in the community that made them invincible in war and indefatigable in all good works in times of peace. It is useless to call for Puritans apart from their religion. Unfortunately many would join with Mr. Burns in admiring the Puritan character who forget this.

The Church Times has the merit of being more outspoken than most of the High Anglican organs, and its editorial note in a recent issue as to the ultimate aim of the Ritualists in the education question is of the essence of frankness:—

We have always been of opinion that the removal of the Cowper-Temple clause by Parliamentary authority is the object which we must work to achieve, and we live in hopes that it will one day be erased from the Statute book.

This means nothing less than the re-opening of the ecclesiastical question in its bitterest and worst form. The religious teaching now given in the schools connected with the London School Board is of the most satisfactory kind possible under the circumstances. The only thing the Editor of the Church Times and his party can possibly be aiming at is to re-introduce distinctively Anglican teaching into the primary national schools, and a proposal in Parliament to do anything of the kind would be the signal for a struggle whose mischievous results would be incalculable. The only way to make this possible is for the Ritualists to capture the London School Board, and this will not happen if, in to-day's contest, the voters will do their duty.

The French authorities have acted with commendable wisdom in forbidding, under severe penalties, any anti-British demonstra- upon the occasion of Mr. Krüger's tour in France. There seems to be a better feeling growing in that country towards ourselves. A few months ago the spirit of animosity was very marked, but both the public men and the newspapers are now changing their tone. This is a matter for thankfulness. Both France and England have quite sufficient to do in setting their own houses in order, without interfering in each other's concerns. We hope that some of our newspapers which magnify every little incident, will take a new line, and do all they can to foster this better feeling between the two great peoples.

In common, we are sure, with many of our readers, we earnestly deplore the turn taken by military operations in South Africa. No one imagined when the war began that it would drag on such a weary length, or degenerate into the burning of the homes of our foes. The problem that confronts our leaders, however, is, how to bring matters to a conclusion, in view of the deception practised by Commanders De Wet and Botha upon their own people. Lord Roberts long ago proclaimed that clemency would be exercised upon all who would lay down their arms, and those who have done so have proved the truth of his words. But so long as the Boer leaders give their followers falsehood for fact, and misrepresent British intentions, it seems as if this miserable wrecking of homes will be continued.

At the same time many thoughtful persons are asking whether this destructive course is advisable as a policy, even if deemed expedient in military tactics. If the British are to occupy the conquered territories, is it wise to embitter the whole population against them? Further, will the present mode of procedure facilitate the termination of the war? These are questions which will have to be asked and answered in Parliament. It is certainly out of accord with British, not to say Christian, instincts to turn women and children homeless upon the veldt; and we yet hope that Lord Roberts will devise some more merciful way.

The reports which continually appear in the daily papers with regard to the position of the Allied troops in China must be received at present with all reserve. So many false rumours have already been exposed, that it makes us extremely cautious in accepting first news as really true. But there seems to be an unaccountable delay on the part of the Powers in really dealing with the situation in China, and certainly there has been some difference between two of the Great Powers as to the method of procedure. Any serious friction amongst the Allies would result in great disaster. The wily Empress, like the Sultan of Turkey, would profit by the discord in the European Concert, and the massacres would speedily be resumed on a scale greater than ever. The least that Europe can demand is the suppression of the inhuman creature who is admittedly at the bottom of the entire trouble. China is not safe whilst the Empress remains in power.

According to certain revelations made in the Spanish papers, that country has, religiously speaking, had a happy escape owing to the Carlist failure to overthrow the present Government. The worst form of persecuting Romanism would have been rampant if that result had been secured. No worship but that of the Roman Church would have been allowed. Persons encouraging any other form would have been condemned to forced labour at the public works for the first offence, and to imprisonment for the second. Heavy penalties would be incurred by persons writing or teaching against the authority of the Roman Church. The number of parishes and churches would have been increased till there was a church for every 300 persons, which would mean an army of 170,000 priests through the country. Such a programme is appalling to consider, and Spain indeed would be the only country where it could have been possibly carried out. Fortunately, among her many trials and evils this added one has been spared her.

If Mr. Blathwayt's recent interview with the Marquis Ito has been accurately reported, and we are to take the statements of "the maker of modern Japan" seriously, there would appear to be grave reasons for anxiety in regard to the future of that interesting country. The Marquis asks—

What is Buddhism or Christianity but a superstition, and therefore, a source of weakness rather than of strength to a nation?

We do not know what the interviewer answered, but as regards Christianity it should have been sufficient to point to the influence of that religion upon the development of Britain. The Marquis does "not regard Japan's almost universal atheism as a source of danger," but he finds such a danger in one point in the new civilization, the lack of reverence and duty, a matter so evident that Mr. Blathwayt does not hesitate to say—

Japan's chief source of danger, her gloomiest outlook for the future, lies in her rising manhood.

We are glad that the London County Council is alive to the dangers of the present day in regard to the licensing of music halls, &c., for the sale of drink. New halls and theatres have been springing up like mushrooms in London and suburbs during the last few years, and it has been a favourite device of the promoters to be content with no drink licence at first, in the hope that it will be obtainable later on. A notable instance is that of the Hippodrome; but the Council adheres to its original decision, as we hope it will in all such cases.

The Dean of Hereford's remark last week that—"the present period is the most critical in the history of the temperance cause, for we have to educate not the lower but the upper classes, since the lower know the evils of drink better than their legislators"—received a remarkable illustration on Sunday week in a sermon preached at St. Paul's Cathedral by Lord W. Cecil, son of the Prime Minister. Speaking of temperance, he said—

Temperance reformers who sought to enforce temperance by force of law differed from the framers of the Inquisition only in that they did not carry their principles to the same extreme. That the blessing of God was not in such means was proved by the failure of all the temperance legislation of the past. He believed, indeed, there had been an advance in temperance, but it was amongst the classes who were unaffected by such legislation, the classes that did not use public-houses. It might be urged that it was necessary to deal with the question as one of law and order. Be it so; but let it be left to worldly-wise men to deal with it as they dealt with other public questions. The management of the world's affairs was not specially entrusted to Christians.

The Dean of Hereford is quite right; the upper classes do need educating about this matter. Lord W. Cecil ought to know that temperance reformers are not seeking to "enforce temperance by force of law," but that they are seeking to correct the evil law which allows liquor to be thrust upon unwilling districts, and so invites men and women to that degradation which is our national curse.

A Welsh minister, conversing upon the present and the past, said that he had had a Bible class of young men for thirty years. Twenty years ago there were twenty-five to thirty in attendance, now there are forty to fifty. But these do not know half as much of Bible truth as the class of twenty-five years ago. We asked, if the members of his church (which is regarded as the wealthiest and most intelligent in the town) were requested to write a statement of some fundamental truth, such as the Atonement, Justification, &c., how many could write intelligently on it? He replied: "Perhaps half-a-dozen—not more."

The reason of this want of knowledge he considered to arise from the fact that their reading of the newspapers and magazines, novels, and light literature of every sort leaves little time or inclination for Bible study. Even Bible-readers lean so much on Biblical helps rather than meditating on the Word itself, that their convictions of truth are slight and their Christian experience is shallow. These views suggest very grave reflections.

A modern writer has insisted that "the greatest snare of the preacher is to be original," and that the greatest snare of the theologian is "to speak of Christ as if He were one of ourselves." Only unsleeping vigilance can escape these pitfalls; and it is well to remember that originality is far from being the greatest of human accomplishments, and that "no great preacher was ever original," simply because to be a great preacher requires close adhesion to the primary and essential truths of man's sin and God's salvation through Christ. These primary and vital facts can have various lights thrown upon them, but they themselves cannot be altered.

The good feeling that is growing between the Evangelical denominations will be put into a practical form, so far as the Baptists and Congregationalists are concerned, at the next May meetings. It has been decided to hold a joint meeting of the two bodies to commemorate the opening of the new century, the Congregationalists meeting a fortnight earlier than usual in order to make this possible. When we consider how impossible this would have been at the commencement of the present century, we realize how "the old order has been changing, giving place to new;" and the new, in this case, is far better than the old. That this movement is proceeding in more than one direction is shown in the cordial and appreciative manner in which the Methodist Times recently spoke of Congregationalism as regards its proposed new departure towards greater solidarity, and the fervent spirit shown by the Congregational Churches generally, in preparing for the great United Mission of next January and February.

Some time ago the Wesleyan Methodists commenced a series of permanent "missions" in large centres, by means of which it was hoped to solve the problem, "How to get non-church goers to the house of God." So far this new departure has proved to be an unqualified success. There are three or four in London; one in Birmingham; in Leeds, an old central chapel, which was practically empty, is now regularly crowded with an audience of 2,000 persons; and in Manchester it is estimated that more than 6,000 people are reached every Sunday evening through the "mission." The services hardly differ at all from the ordinary pattern, save that they are much brighter, and there is nothing stereotyped about their form. Hymn sheets are provided instead of hymn books, and direct conversions are aimed at. In view of the fact that so large a proportion of the population is outside ordinary church life, is it not time to ask whether the stereotyped methods of Sunday services are really the best for accomplishing the work of evangelization? What if the growing indifference towards church attendance is the Holy Spirit's call to consider our methods? The conspicuous success of our Wesleyan brethren in their comparatively new departure affords food for serious reflection upon the whole problem of Home Missions.

We have more than once called attention to the development of Sunday travelling on the part of theatrical companies. The amount of Sunday labour imposed upon the railway servants by special trains for these troupes must be excessive. There are many grave risks and disadvantages in the theatrical life, and this giving up of the Sabbath to wearisome travelling, with its consequent disregard of public worship, is an added evil. Yet provincial theatres depend almost entirely upon this desecration. If professing Christians who patronise the theatre were better acquainted with the conditions under which their amusement is supplied, we believe that more of them would deny themselves for love of the Lord they profess to serve.

The Board of Trade reports show that during one month only—September last—there were no fewer than seventy-two cases of lead poisoning, and eight deaths from what are termed "occupation diseases." Of these latter four were of coachmakers who died of lead-poisoning, others being of people employed in the pottery trade. Yet month after month is permitted to pass without the preventive legislation which is so pressingly called for, and the waste of life continues unchecked, the consequent misery being left to public charity.

A contemporary states that Birmingham is exporting idols to China, the highest priced being those which are supposed to protect against the "foreign devils." The writer reasonably asks some pertinent questions as to the nature of that "trade" which thus exports cheap goods to foster the belief in the protest against which our missionaries and their converts have laid down their lives. Surely in many directions our boasted national prosperity is derived by means that will not bear looking into, and are not based upon righteousness.

Open Doors.

AMONG the many agencies for the advancement of the Kingdom of Christ there are few doing wider and more effective work than the Young Women's Christian Association. Organized in 1855, for forty-five years it has worked, along many different lines, to help the bodies, the minds, and the souls of young women of all classes. As a result of faithful service at home, wider opportunities have come, and the Association is now not British alone but world-wide. Wherever British commerce calls for the presence of young women workers, there is urgent need for organized effort among them. Safe homes and Christian teaching and influence must be provided. The both at home and abroad, is at this time quite unparalleled. There are many openings for cultured and energetic young women. In Great Britain, the actual supply by no means meets the need. India asks for ten workers immediately, and in two cases the salaries are already raised, waiting for the right women. In Africa, five posts are calling for workers, and the Association must be ready to meet the further demands which are inevitable as the country settles.

Training is necessary, and for that the Association has provided a Preparation Home at 32, Bedford Place, London, W.C., where the work can be studied in theory and practice. As the Master Workman, God has often made use of unskilled labour, but that He desires the intelligent co-operation which comes through training is yearly becoming more manifest.

There must be in England women who will appreciate the magnitude and the necessity of this work, and want to offer themselves for it. May these lines provide fit workers for waiting spheres to the glory of God!

The Sin of "Accidie."

"ACCIDIE" is an old mediæval word which is derived from the Latin acedia, itself a derivative of the Greek ἀκηδία, and was used in earlier Christian times to denote a state of mind that was common in the monasteries, i.e., among such as give themselves to a one-sided contemplative life. This state of mind was a disgust with the conditions of life (or with life itself) a sense of its emptiness, a feeling that there was nothing left worthy of effort or high endeavour. Bishop Martensen, in his Christian Ethics, describes it as "a state in which all has become indifferent to a man, nothing can interest him more, all feelings are blunted or extinguished, all ideas even of the highest have become inefficacious . . . and a man has become ensnared in himself and his own evil moods."

We have several instances of this mood in the Bible. Probably it was at the root of the madness that afflicted Saul; Elijah in the wilderness, when he cried out, "Let me die, for I am no better than my fathers," was a victim to it; the Israelites in the wilderness of Paran, longing for the fancied ease of Egypt, when "they despised the pleasant land, and believed not his word, but murmured in their tents, and hearkened not to the voice of the Lord," were conspicuously under its tyranny. In each of these cases, and others, we see the same traits of weariness, of disgust with themselves and the conditions of their lot, and of rebellion against the appointed order of life.

I. This trouble is one that peculiarly afflicts religious people. It is sometimes the fruit of too unbending and monotonous a performance of religious devotions and duties. Even the soul needs its it cannot always soar near heaven, but as the body sleeps, and is so refreshed for its work, so is the soul renewed by the alternations of feeling and activity that follow each other in a healthy and well-regulated life. We must not try ourselves beyond the natural limit of our powers. As Mr. Moody used to say, "A bow that is never unstrung will break."

It is occasionally the reaction after a period of intense religious excitement or exaltation. It is very easy to fall into the Slough of Despond after the first eager determination to live a new life. The profoundest discouragements of life often come after its greatest victories. Elijah on Mount Carmel is a case in point. He had heard the people crying, "The Lord, He is the God; the Lord, He is the God!" as the climax of that great day's experiences; and in the very hour of physical reaction, came Jezebel's threat. Then he, who had brought fire from heaven, suddenly fled before the threat of a woman, and besought God that he might die. In that dreadful hour of self-abasement he felt that

LIFE WAS NO LONGER WORTH LIVING.

II. On the other hand, "accidie" not unfrequently falls on people as the result of the very comforts and blessings of their lives. A large number of women in comfortable suburban homes are afflicted in this way. The necessaries and many of the luxuries of life are secured to them; their husbands are in the city, their children at school; there is no immediate point of interest that appeals to them. Outwardly, they might not unreasonably be expected to be thoroughly and unreservedly happy. And yet many a poor man's wife, who has to earn her living in addition to caring for her husband and children, is ten times as happy as the employer's wife, who has no such strain put upon her, but who, nevertheless, is profoundly miserable in the midst of her comforts—just because she has so little demand made upon her energies.

The remedy here is to find some channel of Christian and philanthropic work into which to throw the mind's energies and the heart's love. It is wonderful what a medicine for "accidie" is found in disinterested and hearty service for others. The fogs of melancholia vanish, and the inner sunshine returns, when we do something for another human being whom we can benefit. How many miserable women would be happy if once they

TASTED THE JOY OF DOING GOOD.

III. Finally, ill-health is at the root of not a little of this trouble. Most of us have to pass through times of physical weakness, when the zest of life disappears, and its fires burn low, and there seems no place left for us in the world outside the sick chamber, or at least the house. There is here, perhaps, a call on our sympathy rather than an opportunity for censure. At the same time, it is in such times of trial that religion should prove its power to uphold and inspire. Those who permit themselves to droop under the scourge of sickness, and to murmur against the severity of life's discipline, and to despise those blessings that remain when one dear possession is taken away, sadly fall short of the Christian temper.

"Wherefore doth a living man complain?" writes the prophet of the Lamentations; and high above even that ringing call to abide by the lot of life, we hear Paul—a man made prematurely old by misfortune and hard persecutions, broken by ill-health and over-work; a prisoner waiting for the inevitable end in a Roman gaol—singing, "I have learned in whatsoever state I am, therein to be content. . . . I know how to be abased, and I know also how to abound; in everything and in all things have I learned the secret both to be filled and to be hungry, both to abound and to be in want." "I can do all things through Christ that strengtheneth me!"

We cannot imagine a man of that noble temper falling into the sin of "accidie"—despising life for its poverty and emptiness. If we "have Christ," He will fill the meanest lot with Divine resources, and in the face of poverty, ruin, sickness, and death, its watchword will be, "Finally, brethren, rejoice in the Lord."

A writer in the very first age of Christianity, the author of the Shepherd of Hermas, concentrates much wisdom into one passage on this subject:—"Put sadness away from thee: for truly sadness is the sister of half-heartedness and bitterness. Array thee in the joy that always finds favour in God's sight, and is acceptable with Him: yea, revel thou therein. For everyone that is joyous, worketh and willeth those things that are good, and despiseth sadness. But he that is sad doth always wickedly; first, he maketh sad the Holy Spirit that hath been given to man to enjoy; and secondly, he worketh lawlessness, in that he neither prays to God nor giveth Him thanks.

"Therefore cleanse thyself from this wicked sadness, and thou shalt live unto God. Yea, unto God all they shall live who have cast out sadness from themselves, and arrayed themselves in all joy."

St. George's Hall, W.—The twenty-fifth anniversary of the fellowship at St. George's Hall, commenced and carried on by the late Mr. Denham Smith and others, is to be celebrated at a meeting to be held at Morley Hall, 26, George Street, Hanover Square, W., Wednesday, December 5, at 8 p.m.

Elisha, the Prophet of Vision.

VI.—An Empty Home (2 Kings iv. 8-37).

By Rev. F. S. WEBSTER, M.A.*

THE Bible is in spirit and temper the most natural and human book in the world. The story of the Shunammite and her child is one of the most touching episodes to be found in it, as well as one of the most beautiful and finished narratives in all literature.

We are introduced to "a great woman," i.e., a lady of great wealth and influence, who dwelt in Shunem, in the plain of Jezreel, the richest and most fertile tract of land in Palestine. She was a woman of keen spiritual perception. The prophet Elisha's occupation earned him the title, "a man of God;" his beautiful character marked him in her eyes as "a holy man of God." Would that the same might be said of all God's public ministers and servants to-day.

Then she was a woman of large-hearted generosity. She took pains and put herself out to entertain the prophet suitably, so that he could enjoy the priceless boon of uninterrupted quiet and retirement.

She was also a woman of the noblest independence. Elisha was anxious to do something to show his appreciation of her kindness, and, as his services in the expedition against Moab had brought him into high favour at court, he offered to speak for her to the king, or captain of the host. Her answer was most dignified, "I dwell among mine own people." She had no need of earthly honours, she enjoyed to the full that purest satisfaction which cannot be surpassed, the satisfaction which comes from duty faithfully performed, and love fully requited. But this great woman was for she had no child to cherish as her very own. She bore the disappointment without a word of complaint. She would not even pray about it lest her prayer might savour of discontent. So Elisha had no idea of it. Gehazi, however, guessed it. He was Elisha's servant, a shrewd man, intensely secular, and naturally suspicious, with little or none of his master's spirituality. But he saw the Shunammite's disappointment, and pointed out to Elisha how he might reward her richly. So the woman was called, and Elisha had the joy of telling her in the name of the Lord, that when the year came round she should embrace a son. The best earthly gifts are those which money cannot buy. Health and dower of children, and mutual confidence and love, increasing with increasing years—these are the best earthly gifts, and they cannot be commanded by the rich or influential; they depend on God's blessing still. So the child was born.

THE MOTHER'S CUP OF JOY WAS FULL.

In welcoming a prophet so kindly, she had indeed "earned a prophet's reward."

This great woman passes through a great sorrow. It was harvest time, and the child, now grown to a lad and full of spirits, rushed out into the fields. Perchance, in his excitement, the head-covering had slipped off, and the slanting rays of the morning sun pierced through to the sensitive brain. The boy was carried to his mother. And there, in the darkened room, the sunshine of the Shunammite returned to the Light of God. It seemed passing strange. Does God take back his gifts? This longed-for but unasked boon, was it sent only to tantalize and annoy?

This great woman overcame, by means of a great trust. Without wasting time in bitter complaints, without even seeking the comfort of her husband's loving sympathy, she lays the child on the prophet's bed, and starts on a long journey to Mount Carmel. It was no light undertaking to cross the plains in the full heat of the day. But she shrinks from no exertion. "Restrain not for me to ride, except I bid thee," is her word to the driver. But the pain in her heart makes her insensible of all other discomfort.

The prophet recognized her in the distance. With sorrow too deep for words, she caught him by the feet, bowing down before him. To the man of conventionalities, the suspicious Gehazi, this seems improper, and he came near to thrust her away. Elisha knew there was a cause. "Let her alone; for her soul is vexed within her." But he knew not what the cause was. "The Lord hath hid it from me, and hath not told me," he said. It seemed strange to him not to share the secret, for this man of vision generally saw God's doings clearly. So the woman makes reference to her trouble. She cannot tell it out. Her heart is still echoing the cry, "It is well with the child." She merely says: "Did I desire a son of my lord? Did I not say, do not deceive me?"

Elisha saw that her faith needed educating. She had placed the boy on the prophet's bed, and had hastened to find him, as though the prophet himself possessed the needed power to restore her son. The lesson for us, however, is clear and all-important. The prophet's staff was no substitute for the prophet himself. The most Scriptural formulæ are powerless without faith. Divinely appointed ordinances or sacraments are useless without the Holy Spirit. We use the staff of ordinances wrongly unless they help us to shut the door on all save the living God. They are but means to an end, and if for a moment the end is lost sight of, the means are being wrongly used.

So now there is to be union and identification between

THE PROPHET AND THE DEAD CHILD.

Within the shut door the prophet stretches himself out on the dead boy, eyes on eyes, mouth on mouth, hands on hands, as though he would impart his own life to the child. Yes, his action seems to say: "Either let him share life with me, or let me share death with him. We two will be one." And at once the cold body seemed to catch some of his living warmth. But the prophet has to desist. He feels the chill of death lowering his own temperature, lessening his vitality. So he gets up from the bed and walks to and fro in the house. The Christian worker must not forget to do this. We cannot grapple with the dead around us without some danger of infection or chill from their cold, materialistic, cynical spirit. We must take pains to keep our own spiritual life strong and full, or we shall do no good whatever to others. But, his own heat restored, he once more stretches himself upon the child, and very soon the boy sneezes and opens his eyes. The mother is called, and receives a second time this precious gift from God.

It must have been a touching scene as the night wore on, and the father could not hear enough of the wonderful story of his wife's courage and devotion and faith. "To think that you never told me of our sorrow, O noble, loving heart: to suffer alone, to bear the toil, the suspense, the anguish of heart, and to trust God so bravely through it all!" Shall not we learn the lesson of faith from this Shunammite? Our loss may not always so soon be turned to gain, but then we know Him better who orders every joy or sorrow in our lives. Jesus is far better than Elisha; let us take what He sends, with thankful, trustful hearts. "What I do," He often seems to say to us, "thou knowest not now, but thou shalt know hereafter."

"The Backyard of London."—Under this title a comprehensive and readable account of the philanthropic efforts maintained in connection with the London Congregational Union has been issued. "The Backyard of London" is the East End, and the work at Medland Hall, Ratcliff, in that needy district, is fully described. It will be remembered that Medland Hall is the only free shelter in London always open to homeless men. Copies of the report may be had from Rev. Andrew Mearns, Memorial Hall, Farringdon Street, E.C.

The Suffering Poor.—Miss Annie F. Perram, hon. sec. of the Mission of Help to the Suffering Poor, 90, Darenth Road, Stamford Hill, N., writes: "We have many cases of urgent need before us at the present time. Some of these are widows with little children dependent upon their slender earnings. In some homes the breadwinner is laid aside by incurable disease, while aged men and women appeal to us to save them from breaking up their home to enter the workhouse. Will our friends help us to come to the assistance of the many who, in want and weakness, seek the aid of the Mission?"

The Mercies of God!

(Psalm ciii.)

By Mr. CHAS. COOK.

EVERY piece of music has its key-note, and so each psalm seems to have its key-word; and the careful student of the Word will discover that in this Psalm God's "mercy"—or its plural "mercies"—is the leading truth declared. In verse 4, having spoken of forgiveness, healing, and deliverance, the Psalmist says: "Who crowneth thee with loving-kindness and tender mercies." Here notice

THE QUALITY OF THE MERCIES.

The believer stands as much in need of the mercies of God after his conversion as he did, when "God, who is rich in mercy for his great love wherewith He loved us, even when we were dead in sins, quickened us together with Christ."

Can we not all look back on the way He hath led us, and remember how we had gone astray but for his special guidance; and how we had made some huge mistake, save that by an interposition of grace, He prevented and restrained; and in such a way, that led us to exclaim, "Thy gentleness hath made me great." God is exceedingly fatherly in all his acts towards his children, and when we have expected the rod, He has often dealt with us in the most tender manner.

A man may have mercy on a fallen foe, but exercise it in a haughty spirit; a conqueror may spare his enemy for diplomacy sake, for the tender mercies of the wicked are cruel; but "The tender mercies of the Lord" are over all his works; and especially seen in his gracious dealings with his ofttimes graceless creatures. See the chivalry of that soldier who, rushing through the zone of fire, rescues his wounded comrade, and, throwing him over his shoulder, staggers back to the firing line; but who by his rough handling of the poor sufferer has almost jolted the life out of his body.

But see, when, a few hours later, the wounded man is being tended in the base hospital by the gentle nurse, who, with tender hands and womanly heart, wipes the heated brow, and with padded shoes, moves noiselessly about the ward, acting as only a gentle, thoughtful, loving woman can act; in the contrast see something of the quality of the mercies of our God. Thanks be unto God for his loving-kindness and his tender mercies! No wonder David said: "Let us now fall into the hand of the Lord, for his mercies are many and great; and let me not fall into the hand of man."

But in the eighth verse we read, "The Lord is merciful and gracious, slow to anger, and plenteous in mercy." Here we have not the quality, but

THE MEASURE OF GOD'S MERCY!

Surely, where sin abounds grace doth much more abound. Manasseh, in the Old Testament, is saved, and has the longest reign in Scripture; and Saul of Tarsus, in the New, is converted, and thus the chief of sinners becomes "not a whit behind the very chiefest apostle."

Standing in the market-place of a city in the East, I saw a man leading several camels approach a corn merchant, who was seated behind a small mountain of corn. The merchant was soon busy filling a large measure, which when full he pressed down with both hands, and then again filled up the wooden measure; taking it with both hands he shook it for a moment till the corn occupied a still smaller space, leaving room for more at the top; again more corn was poured in, and after heaping it up till it formed a small pyramid, he poured it out into the sack of the buyer. Then understood I the meaning of my Master's words—"Give good measure, pressed down and shaken together, and running over."

Surely this is how God deals with us—hearken! "Then came Peter to Him and said, Lord, how often shall my brother sin against me and I forgive him? Till seven times? Jesus saith unto him, I say not unto thee until seven times; but until seventy times seven." Four hundred and ninety times! What the Lord preached, He also practised; for the next verse in the same chapter tells of one who was forgiven ten thousand talents, which means many thousands of pounds sterling.

Truly the measure of God's mercy is wonderful! He saves the worst of sinners, and keeps the weakest of his saints; the salvation of the whomsoever (which implies man's responsibility) is equalled by the preservation of the whomsoever, which tells of sovereign grace; for the hands of Jesus never let go. The 11th verse of the Psalm, however, gives us another view of the mercy of the Lord! "For as the heaven is high above the earth, so great is his mercy toward them that fear Him." This has reference not to the quality, nor to the measure, but to

THE EXTENT OF HIS MERCY!

Touching his people, is there any limit to the mercy of our God? Look at the figure chosen. The height of the heavens! If the nearest fixed star be twenty billions of miles from the earth; this is a wondrous comparison, but more is meant than this. Herschel tells us that he discovered a second layer of stars beyond the sight of human eye, as far in height beyond what we see as is Sirius distant from the earth, and that by an increase of power of lens he found the stellar heavens 500 layers deep, each layer, at least, an equal distance apart. Later astronomical researches would go beyond this; but if we multiply 500 by 20 billions of miles it may help us to comprehend something of the extent of the mercy of our God.

It is not singular that the twelfth verse of the same Psalm helps to continue the figure God hath chosen to convey the knowledge of his infinite mercy to us. Look at it—"As far as the east is from the west, so far hath He removed our transgressions from us."

This verse tells of the length and breadth of God's mercy, while the previous verse speaks of the height and the depth of it. If four angels started on a voyage through space, flying on the wings of light at 12,000,000 miles a minute, north, east, south, and west, might they not fly throughout eternity, and never dash their pinions 'gainst the walls of the house which Jehovah inhabiteth?

"God's Universe contains no finite bounds
To echo back to Him responsive sounds;
These echoes come from hearts that live,
These back to God responses give.
'Go worlds,' said God, 'but learn ere ye depart,
My favourite temple is the human heart;
There to reside I'd leave my loftiest skies,
There shall my Holy of all Holies rise.'"

The seventeenth verse of the Psalm completes the picture. Here the Psalmist, having dealt with the quality, which is tender, the measure, which is plenteous, the extent, which is great, closes his description of the mercy of God by saying—"The mercy of the Lord is from everlasting to everlasting upon them that fear Him." This tells of

THE DURATION OF HIS MERCY.

"Love me little, love me long" runs the song; and the believer can sing, "The mercy of the Lord endureth for ever." God hath chosen these two eternal figures of space and duration to convey to our finite minds the measure of his mercy towards us. There never was an hour when God did not love his people; there shall never be a day when He shall cease to love them; whether you gaze down the ages of a past eternity, or look prospectively along the cycles of a coming eternity—Thus saith the Lord, "The mercy of the Lord is from everlasting to everlasting upon them that fear Him."

He loved us e'en ever we had a beginning,
Predestined that we should be brought to the light;
Our wanderings, departures, our sins, all-foreseeing,
Yet gave his good Spirit to lead us aright!

Let us with the Psalmist continually repeat, "O give thanks unto the Lord; for He is good; for his mercy endureth for ever!"

Where is the Church of God? asked Alexander Peden, the Scottish Covenanter. He answered: "I will tell you where it is—it is wherever a praying man or woman is at a dyke-side."

Home Missions.

A Splendid Record.

THE MANCHESTER MISSION.

THE Manchester Wesleyan Mission was begun fifteen years ago by Rev. S. F. Collier, so that last Tuesday's (November 20) gatherings marked the fourteenth anniversary. These great meetings were almost unknown outside Manchester until five years ago, when the late Dr. Berry, of Wolverhampton, was one of the principal speakers. For months afterwards, in all parts of the country, he declared those meetings to have been the finest he ever attended.

At noon on Tuesday Rev. J. G. Greenhough, M.A., of Leicester, preached the annual sermon in the Central Hall, and in the afternoon the Sisters occupied to the full the great Free Trade Hall. Miss Emily Wood, of Southport, presided. She urged the great need for Christians to rally round such great centres of Christian effort as the Manchester Mission. She appealed strongly to the Christians present so to live and labour as to transform the corrupt cities of the land into holy cities of God.

Lady Henry Somerset, who was received with ringing cheers, said she believed the great need of the day was more Christian sympathy, and the great need of the churches the closer drawing together of Christians. She praised the magnificent temperance work the Mission carried on. It was to such work, quietly, strenuously, and enthusiastically done, that any advance in the temperance cause was due. In the Sisters of the People, and their priceless power of love, the poor had individual friends and found individual sympathy. Lady Henry then told of her attempt to reclaim poor Jane Cakebread. Jane received her coldly at first, but the clouds dispersed when she said, "Why, Miss Cakebread, I have just called upon you

AS ONE LADY DOES UPON ANOTHER."

Our daily attitude should be one of love, work, prayer, and sympathy. Lady Henry's sweet, winning eloquence stirred many hearts.

Sister Pattie, the superintendent of the Women's Social Work, spoke of the more hopeful side of their work. A discouraged man or woman was never successful in Christian work. In their work they tried never to lose heart, and were always prepared to give the fallen ones another chance. Many of the women they sought to help were more sinned against than sinning, far more weak than wicked. The heroism and self-sacrifice of those helped were wonderful. Their greatest difficulty was drink. The increase of drinking among women was very alarming; 649 women and girls had passed through the Mission Shelter during the year, all being helped to brighter and better lives. They had contributed over £91 as thankofferings from their scanty earnings. One woman, who was in the Shelter a few days before, had not had a bath for over ten years! Another woman had had nine children, their father being her own brother. The great hope the Sisters had in their work was the power of the Cross of Christ.

Sister Lillie, of the Central Hall, also spoke sweetly and effectively, telling how the Mission Sisters went to those lowest sunk in sin, and led them back to goodness and God.

In the evening the Free Trade Hall was densely crowded when, before the advertised time, Mr. Cuthbert Bainbridge took the chair. On the platform were scores of the best known ministers and laymen of the district, belonging to all the churches.

The Chairman, in a bright speech, spoke of the work and worth of the Mission, and pleaded for increased help for his old schoolfellow, Mr. Collier. The work of all the churches was to regenerate cities, build up a true British Empire and a new moral world.

Rev. S. F. Collier was loudly cheered when he rose to give the report, which he did in an eloquent speech. He read several letters of apology. Dr. McLaren wrote: "Nobody has a higher appreciation of your great work or can more warmly wish you prosperity and progress than I have and do. We are all indebted to you and your staff." Rev. F. B. Meyer, B.A., wrote: "Best birthday greetings to yourself and your people. All who know what you are doing are helped and stimulated by your noble and unceasing work for God and man. The Mission is an object lesson for us all. You seem to have solved the problem of perpetual motion." Mr. R. W. Perks, M.P., sent 100 guineas for the collection, and wrote, "As I read the summary of your evangelistic and social work, I am reminded of early Methodism and that indomitable Christian reformer who, in season and out of season, was a true servant of the people—Wesley."

Mr. Collier said that the Mission costs £10,000 a year to carry on. Their own Mission adherents raised £7,500 of this. They only asked £2,500 from outside. The Mission had a greater hold upon the city than ever. They were directly every week. They had a staff of thirty-four workers, with over 1,000 enrolled voluntary workers. All these had a unity of aim, with much diversity of method. They believed in giving the bottom man a chance. They trained working men and women to get hold of their comrades. They did not claim to have solved all the problems of their city life, but they had done their best to face the misery and lessen the suffering. It was not enough to hear of misery with a sigh and dismiss it with a shudder.

Dr. Thomas Allen, the president of the Wesleyan Conference, spoke of the fraternal feelings that existed between the various sections of the one church. The twentieth century would witness the healing of a good many of their paltry divisions. The working people of this country had no prejudice against religion. The people would respond if they went to them in the spirit of brotherhood.

Rev. J. G. Greenhough said the meeting was a witness of what Methodists could do in these degenerate days. He did not believe in the phrase, "lapsed masses." The people thus spoken of had not fallen — they had never reached a state of grace. They could never be reached except by the evangelic faith. The Catholic revival had spent its force. It had made a great attempt to gather in the masses but had almost utterly failed. Lord Halifax had said that the masses of the people were sick of the negatives of a dying Protestantism. It was not possible to crowd more untruths into one short sentence. The masses of the people were sick of the tomfoolery, the genuflexions and gestures and processions and altar lights and incense and nonsense that were converting hundreds of churches into peep-shows.

Revs. F. L. Wiseman and S. Chadwick also addressed the meeting. Mr. Collier announced that the collections for the day amounted to upwards of £2,250.

Speech for the Deaf.

AN interesting experiment, which has developed into an accomplished fact, is being carried on by Mrs. Masters at Gravelly Hill, near Birmingham, on behalf of deaf and dumb children. It is best described in her own words:—

"The children are taught to speak by mechanically producing sounds—they imitate the teacher's opening and closing of the mouth, lips and teeth; and, by a close study of the physiology of the throat and vocal organs, the teacher gradually gets the child to make its noises into clear articulate speech, not perhaps with much modulation of tone, but at any rate, so as to be understood by a hearing person. At the same time the child acquires the habit of reading the words spoken by the lips—'lip-reading' we call it; this is done so rapidly that they can understand even a stranger, provided the speaker will open his mouth and speak distinctly."

It is wonderful what a wide range of subjects the curriculum embraces, and the results are most encouraging. Parents with afflicted children may like to now of such a useful school as this.

On Behalf of Public Morality.

ONE of the best, and least obtrusive, of recently-formed agencies is the London Council for the Promotion of Public Morality, which has made it its business to do all that organized effort can do to purify the streets of London, and remove obvious temptations to immorality. After three years of preparatory work, the committee have been greatly encouraged by the almost unexpected amount of recognition of the gravity of the issue, and of the need of resolute and judicious action, shown by responsible citizens. It had been previously clearly proved that this work of cleansing the streets of London cannot be done by epidemics of reforming zeal, but by quiet and persistent effort behind the scenes. It is the aim of this Council to try a less sensational and more continuous method—that of steady co-operation between public authority and private endeavour.

Already, we are glad to hear, the Council has not only collected a large amount of information about the moral condition of the city and suburbs, but has formed strong local committees within all the new boroughs of London, so that the new municipalities may count on such a body of public opinion as is needful, in such parts of the administration of local government in support of public morality.

The lines are laid down; what remains now is that the public should provide the committee with adequate means for carrying on their work. The officers, including the Bishop of London, Bishop Barry, Lord Kinnaird (the originator of the Council), appeal for an annual income of £2,000 for the due prosecution of their vitally important work. It is not a large sum, and ought to be easily raised. It is a matter that concerns the well-being of the community to its foundations, and should not for a moment lack the necessary support.

Home of Industry.

THE two halls at the Home of Industry, Bethnal Green Road, presented a busy scene on Wednesday evening, November 21, on the occasion of the workers' meeting. On one floor the kind friends who attended were entertained, and in the upper hall was held a gathering of our aged widows, who are connected with the weekly classes in the Home, in number about eighty. They had donned their Sunday attire, and though in some cases shawls and boots were thin, they presented a tidy appearance. Many an aged face looked bright and happy, as friends from various parts of our great city spoke loving words of cheer and sympathy.

Another feature of interest was the new dispensary and consulting room, into which one of the class rooms has been transformed. This is to be the headquarters of the "Free Medical Mission," to which the nursing department has been enlarged.

Dr. Henry Soltau, of St. Giles' Medical Mission, gave the first address, which was founded on Acts x. 38. Dr. Edward Merry, who followed, described the need for medical work among the sick poor of the district, and said that, after qualifying as M.D., he had been led to offer himself to take up the Medical Mission work. Dr. Merry asked prayer that this fresh branch of service may be abundantly blessed. Miss Abrams, from India, working with Pandita Ramabai, subsequently gave a touching account of the Pandita's labours for young Hindoo widows. C.R.S.

Newcastle-upon-Tyne Circus Services.—In the spring of 1884 these services were inaugurated. Although not held continuously in the same hall, they have been kept near the centre of the city, and are now conducted in the building in which they were commenced—the Circus, now the Palace Theatre. The services are being sustained amid many signs of encouragement. From the large attendances at the services, and the numbers of seekers after salvation, it is obvious that the gatherings have been fruitful in their results. Unfortunately at the present time the work is somewhat hindered by reason of an adverse balance on year's accounts. The treasurer is Mr. T. W. Sharp, Blythswood South, Newcastle-on-Tyne.

With Wandsworth Poor.

LONDON, south of the Thames, has many a dark and dismal district. Whole labyrinths of streets and lanes may be discovered, in which some little and almost unheard-of mission is well nigh the only active and aggressive evangelizing effort. Such a district is that beyond Vauxhall and along the Wandsworth Road. Here is a network of narrow streets, peopled by the poor and labouring classes, largely on the one-room principle, and living practically in the shadow and darkness of spiritual death. In 1869 Mr. John Soames, the founder and present superintendent of the Howard Street Gospel Mission and Sunday and Ragged School, visited the district with a few friends, distributing tracts and conducting open-air meetings.

In 1873 a room was opened in a cottage in Howard Street, where a Gospel service was held on Sunday afternoons. This continued for some time; but, owing to the rough element which prevailed, the meeting had to be given up. The work of open-air meetings, tract distributing, &c., was still successfully carried on in the street and surrounding neighbourhood. Other rooms were opened in different parts of the district, where much good was accomplished, the work being owned and blessed of God in the salvation of many souls. Early in 1885 we were determined, however, after much prayer, to recommence operations in Howard Street, which was accordingly done, and after a few alterations we commenced work again. The people received us gladly on this occasion, knowing that our mission was to do them good. Six meetings were held during the week, and many conversions have resulted from our humble efforts.

Progress, however, was once more impeded. Owing to the lease of the houses having expired, and the Board of Works requiring to make public improvements, we had again to seek refuge in other quarters. But in the course of a few months, through the kindness of many friends, we were to be seen in active operation at our present mission, which is built on a portion of the ground where the old mission house used to stand, and has been secured on lease. As the Howard Street Gospel Mission now stands, it is a small hall, much too small for actual requirements. A thoroughly practical work has been maintained since the commencement.

Many and varied are the efforts put forth for reaching young and old, which may be summarized under the following:—Preaching the Gospel, feeding the hungry, clothing the naked, and visiting the sick. Friends are asked to help this work, which has been quietly and economically carried on to the honour and glory of God. E. M. Soames.

Poplar Rescue Work.

THE young girl who came to us through a paragraph in The Christian, is striving to do her duty. I have found a good Christian woman to take the young mother and her child. She will help in the house, and be a daughter to this childless lady. The Home is full, and we have some wonderful instances of the working of God in our midst. Sunday after Sunday girls who have been years in service come to visit us. One came last week, who has been caretaker for some years in an institution, and she brought with her such a good character. We especially endeavour to aid those who are newly fallen from virtue, in order to prevent them from embarking on a vicious career. The past year has been one of difficulty, but I intend never to give up until He calls me home. (Mrs.) Anna Wilkes.

Manor Cottage, 31, Sturry Street, Poplar.

Cricklewood.—At the Midland Railway "Brent Sidings" at Cricklewood, and in the engine sheds, a large number of men are employed. The population of the place, indeed, consists mainly of railway people. In connection with the Claremont Road Mission, cottage and parlour meetings are held for children. It is hoped that Midland Railway shareholders will contribute to the cost of the mission hall which is being built.

Glasgow Foundry Boys.

AT the annual meeting, a few days ago, of the Glasgow Foundry Boys' Religious Society, Lord Provost Chisholm received a specially affectionate welcome and tribute of sympathy on his reappearance after his recent bereavement. On his own part, as president, he extended a warm greeting to his fellow-workers. Recalling old memories connected with the foundation of the Society in 1865, he showed that while the one meeting has grown to eighty, and girls are now admitted as well as boys, the essential features and characteristics of the work are the same. The place and power of the Bible may be questioned by newspaper writers, but here it is the very centre of all. "From the youngest and newest member on our roll, to the oldest and most experienced worker, we all cling to the precious Revelation of God as the one anchor of our personal hope, and the one means of proclaiming salvation." With great enthusiasm he referred to the fact that a large number of the workers are men and women who were themselves brought to the truth in connection with the work.

Speaking of discouragements to Christian workers, Rev. Ambrose Shepherd appealed to speakers and teachers to use all their influence to save the rising generations from (1) "athletics run mad." He remembered the eloquence of English reformers who struggled to have the franchise and education for the people; but now they have both, and "I venture to say that as compared with the resources, opportunities, and chances of the day, there is less solid reading, less interest in political and social questions, and for their own sake, than there was twenty-five years ago." (2) The vice of gambling. "I know a factory in which it is no uncommon thing for between £50 and £100 to be taken in a week, in small bets, from lads under fifteen years of age. . . . Were it not for the hope that lies in our children, I sometimes think God might despair, and good men and women break their hearts; but while without Christ I hope nothing, with Christ I despair of nothing for this world." While conversion was the one end aimed at, he pleaded earnestly for the "keeping of the road to conversion open," by resisting the evils that fascinate the rising youth.

A truly wonderful tale of success in mission work fell from the lips of Rev. Donald Fraser (Livingstonia), yet joined with the note of triumph was a loud call to face the responsibilities following such blessing; and a warning of the danger of delay, for the Mohammedans and Roman Catholics are pressing in from every side to take possession of Central Africa.

The City Treasurer, Mr. Alexander Murray, bore witness to the large amount of work done in the Society by helpers who themselves have to labour long hours for small wages. Rev. Alexander Brown (Pollokshields) spoke some solemn words on the great danger to the community of allowing the continuance of a large, youthful class which is practically un-Christianized.

A New House of Rest.

THE Hon. Lucy E. Portman has thrown open her house at Blandford, Dorset, as a Home of Rest for missionaries on furlough and other workers. In the course of a letter on the subject, Miss Portman says: "I know that many missionaries, having broken up their homes before going abroad, are obliged to spend their furlough in lodgings, at great expense and with little comfort. The house at Blandford is comfortably furnished, and two ladies live there who would make it their pleasure to care in every way for the comfort of the visitors. Blandford, which is a quiet little country town, is well supplied with places of worship of different denominations, and there are pretty walks and drives in the neighbourhood. It is within easy reach of Bournemouth, Salisbury, Weymouth, &c. The terms are moderate, arranged so as to cover expenses only. I shall be glad if anyone wishing to have particulars will apply to me at Broadley, Grove Road, Bournemouth."

Oxford Letter.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

OXFORD is to be congratulated on having Mr. Grey as the new Principal of Wycliffe. Already his influence is being felt in the churches, and, like his predecessor, he is ever ready to give his services. His sermon in St. Aldate's for the Bible Society, was a most instructive one.

Rev. H. Foster Pegg spent Sunday and Monday in Oxford, being the deputation for the Church Pastoral Aid Society. He preached three times on Sunday, and spoke at the meeting on Monday. After hearing his three sermons, the secret of Mr. Pegg's success is plain. He preaches a full Gospel, with sympathy, power, and directness.

The Master of Pembroke presided at an anti-vivisection meeting on Tuesday, and, in the course of his address, urged that whatever cuts us off from humanity can never be right. Man must deteriorate exactly in proportion as he silences his heart to cruelty. To inflict unnecessary pain was cruelty. He held that to practise cruelty, even for a high end, must blunt the delicate moral fibres of students, whether of science or of medicine. Dr. Reinhardt and Lady Pender were the other speakers.

Speaking at a meeting of the Wesleyan Foreign Missions, Rev. W. B. Simpson, of Madras, said that the whole ground of interest in missions is changing. The old time of romance is gone, and the new interest must lie in hearing the heart-beats of our friends over the sea. He mentioned the two movements in India which were practically meeting each other—the movement of the masses, and the movement of thought. India, like China, is passing through a profoundly interesting stage, and whether for good or for evil, it is changing.

I regret to announce the death of Mrs. Paget, wife of the Dean of Christ Church, which took place on Thursday evening. Mrs. Paget caught a chill a week ago, but left her room to help to welcome the Colonials from South Africa, and then had a relapse. Much sympathy is felt for the Dean in his sudden bereavement, and Mrs. Paget will be greatly missed in Oxford by all classes. She was a true friend to the poor. "She never missed giving us a kind word," was the remark of a cabman to the writer on Thursday evening, when the news of her death was published. As late as last week Mrs. Paget also entertained the Mothers' Union at Christ Church.

Lady Henry Somerset addressed a meeting in the Town Hall on Tuesday week on behalf of the Industrial Farm Colony for Inebriate Women established at Duxhurst, Surrey. Sir William Markby presided. We cull some thoughts from an exceedingly interesting speech. "The appalling conditions in which thousands of people live cannot be ignored in discussing the temperance reform. Yet the liquor traffic is the great soporific that keeps thousands of people in conditions against which they would otherwise rebel." Her experience did not, however, coincide with the idea that the increase of drunkenness was confined to the people who live in these surroundings, for a large proportion of the applications for admission to the Home were from respectable artizans, tradespeople, and gentlemen. Lady Henry gave two reasons, "tentatively," she said, for this. Heredity, which to say the least, weakens the will; and the breaking down of the barrier between women and the public-house. In America respectable women are never seen drinking in public. In England this is no longer considered a disgrace. Subsequently Lady Henry told us that sixty per cent at least of those who have passed through the home are doing well.

Rotherhithe Sailors' Rest.

ONE of the last public acts of the late Mr. Samuel Plimsoll was to open a small temporary Sailors' Rest at Surrey Commercial Docks.

The present building, a rented one, has become inadequate to meet the need. Since its opening a great amount of Christian work has been done in the interests of seamen, and blessing has been given.

The Rest is open all day and every day. Its usefulness is increasingly appreciated, and will be more so when the docks are completed.

An effort has been made to secure larger and permanent premises. It is hoped that the Dock Company will grant a site. It is estimated that the cost of erection will be at least £4,000. Further particulars may be obtained from Mr. G. R. Hood, the district secretary, British and Foreign Sailors' Society, who may be addressed—Sailors' Rest, Rotherhithe, S.E.

Day by Day.

SUNDAY, December 2. Jeremiah xxv.

THE repetition of God's entreaties through Jeremiah, to arrest the downward progress of his people, is very touching. For three-and-twenty years the word of the Lord had come to the prophet, and he had passed it forward with all the urgency of which he was capable, "rising up early and speaking." But the people were absolutely obdurate, until there was no alternative but to silence the voices of mirth and gladness, and to extinguish the light of the candle. If we harden our hearts against God's love our destruction is inevitable. If we will not bend, we must break. If the golden pruning knife is not strong enough, the iron pruning knife will be employed. For three years the owner of the vineyard comes seeking fruit, and finally he may have to cut down the tree.

The prophet looks out on the surrounding nations, names them in order, and predicts that upon them too would fall the sword of Divine vengeance. Especially notice v. 29; it suggests the words of the Apostle, "The time is come for judgment to begin at the House of God; and if it begin first with us, what shall be the end of them that obey not the Gospel of God?" (1 Pet. iv. 19).

Under the figure of a lion, the prophet depicts God as tearing the flock and driving the shepherds back in dismay. This also carries our mind forward to the seer's vision of the Lord, as the Lion of the tribe of Judah, who appears in the midst of the throne on behalf of his own. Ah! soul, it is well for thee to make peace with God; lest He who would fight on thy behalf should become thine enemy, and the might which would have secured thee from peril should turn against thee to thine undoing.

Jeremiah was never so near martyrdom as at the time described in this chapter. The old hatred of the priest and the false prophet arose against him, and communicated itself to the people. In miniature it was a similar incident to the closing scene of our Saviour's life. The accusation against our Lord, as against Jeremiah, was that he had anticipated the destruction of the Temple. If any man dare to speak his mind to-day, if it conflicts with the prevailing sentiment, how certainly will he have to pay the price of hatred. Is it for this reason that the Christian Church refrains at the present juncture from insisting on our Lord's command to love our enemies, and do good to those who are in arms against us?

The princes interfered, and their appeal to the people seems to have turned the fickle populace to be as antagonistic to the false priests as they had previously been to the prophet. Notice specially v. 16. How fickle is the voice of the people. "Hosanna," to-day; to-morrow, "Crucify." Let us dare to do right in the sight of God, following out the impulse of his Spirit, and ceasing from man whose breath is in his nostrils.

Why Micaiah escaped death, whilst Uriah was called to encounter it, we know not, any more than we can tell, in the recent Chinese massacres, why some of God's children were called to the crown of martyrdom, whilst others escaped with their lives. If we begin to inquire, the Lord answers us, as He did a similar question from the apostle Peter, "If I will that he tarry till I come, what is that to thee; follow thou Me?" Each life is a distinct plan of God's.

TUESDAY, December 4. Jeremiah xxvii.

For each of us there is a yoke, something that restrains our liberty, and makes life hard. Naturally we desire deliverance from it, and listen to false prophets, who prophesy after the sight of their eyes and impulse of their hearts, assuring us that we need not accept it. How often do our deceived hearts lead us astray, till the voice of Christ comes to us saying: Bring your neck under my yoke, and serve Me and live. "Take my yoke upon you and learn of Me." And if we ask Him what his yoke stands for, He replies, Meekness and lowliness of heart; whereof meekness stands for our temper in respect to injury and injustice from the hands of man, whilst lowliness is the attitude we should maintain before God.

The prophet put a distinct limit upon the supremacy of Nebuchadnezzar, during which all nations should serve him, and then they should serve themselves of him (v. 7). So the time of your oppression is limited. There is a "thus far" beyond which the stern discipline shall not go. God knows exactly the limits of your strength, and the time required for the execution of his Divine purpose.

The suggestion which Jeremiah made that the prophets should make intercession that the vessels left in the Temple should remain there, was a very sensible one, because it was bringing them to a test which everybody could appreciate. Their evasion of this test proved their falsehood. So in discerning the voice of God from the many voices that speak within your heart, if you will do whatever He commands you, you will come to know which is of God. In John ii. 9: "The servants . . . knew." If you serve, you, too, will know.

WEDNESDAY, December 5. Jeremiah xxviii.

Hananiah was without doubt very popular. It was not easy for Jeremiah to stand alone, as we find him doing in v. 5.

What a picture is presented, as these two prophets oppose each other in the presence of priests and people in the house of God! By his amen to the words of Hananiah, the true prophet avowed his passionate desire that his hopes might be realized, but he knew certainly that they could not be. Hananiah closed the conference by breaking the yoke which Jeremiah carried on his neck, but the prophet of God made no reply, he simply went his way. It is good not to hold altercations with men who have set their hearts on opposing the truth. Better yield quietly and go your way. Better say nothing than speak in temper. Hold your peace, even from good, until you know precisely what is the message from the Lord.

The word of the Lord did come to him afterwards: that iron would be substituted for wood, that the land would be given up to the beasts of the field, that Hananiah should die. And God vindicated his words by the false prophet's sudden decease. The man who can commit himself to Him that judgeth righteously cannot fail of vindication.

THURSDAY, December 6. Jeremiah xxix.

It was wise for Jeremiah to write this letter, encouraging the exiles in Babylon to settle in the country, and seek the peace of the city whither they were carried away captive. It was dictated by faith in the assurance that seventy years had to pass before they could expect deliverance. Many who read these words may be carried captive into strange lands; the servant in his situation, the young man or woman in the great city establishment, the occupant of the workhouse or hospital, the lonely exile in some foreign land—to each and all the prophet's words are applicable. Make the best of your circumstances and look around for opportunities of blessing others. The Apostle acted thus when he sought the conversion of the guards to whom he was chained during his Roman imprisonment.

Notice that, when God seems severest in his dealings with us, thoughts of grace and love still fill his heart, and there is hope in our latter end, like clear Western heavens after a day of rain. That is in store for thee, which shall make thee forget the pain through which thou hast passed. And as the darkness comes to an end, and the light begins to break, it becomes easy to pray to Him. Even though the result is known and predestinated, prayer is needful as a link to its accomplishment. Ponder in this connection vv. 11-13.

The prophet's words excited great annoyance among the false prophets in Babylon, two of whom were punished by a terrible death (22), and the other forfeited posterity and name. But in spite of everything, God's word should stand. Through all opposition, He will still secure good for his people (vv. 11-32). Trust in Him; all the powers in hell and on earth cannot make Him abandon his loving purpose for thy salvation and deliverance.

FRIDAY, December 7. Jeremiah xxx.

In these chapters Jeremiah throws himself forward into the later years of the captivity, when the known world was to be shaken with the tidings of the Medo-Persian invasion of Chaldea, in which Belshazzar, the grandson of Nebuchadnezzar, would be slain. This was necessary to the liberation of the Jews from their captivity, but it would be rather terrifying to them and others, so these words were prepared to re-assure them. It would be the day of Jacob's trouble, but he would be saved from it (7).

What gracious promises are those which follow. God sets Himself to speak in the tenderest and most reassuring tones. "Fear thou not, neither be dismayed, for I will save thee." I heard the other day of a young father who was walking to and fro in the dining-room of his house, with his first-born babe in his arms. His wife noticed that two or three times he carried his precious burden into a large dark closet at the end of the room, and asked him the reason. He answered that every time he went into the dark, the little one gave a tiny start and clung closer to him, and he found it so delightful to feel the tiny nestling movement, which gave him the chance to press the nurseling nearer him. Perhaps God often carries us into the dark, that we may cling closer to Him, and that He may have the better opportunity of speaking his tender words of reassurance.

Art thou a backslider? Art thou suffering from an incurable grievous wound? Have thy sins increased, bringing on thee pain and sorrow? Listen! if thou wilt but confess and put away thy sins, God will bring thee again and restore health unto thee, and to thy mourners. And what He will do for the individual He will do for the Church, as well as for his chosen people. Our sins paralyze his arm of saving might, but He waits to be gracious. Very blessed and far-reaching is the promise, "Behold, I will bring again the captivity of Jacob's tents" (18).

SATURDAY, December 8. Jeremiah xxxi.

O everlasting love of God, how strong, and tender, and true art thou—given to us in the Beloved, who has put away all restraining barriers, and thrown open the very flood-gates of mercy! What more can be said, than is said here, of the ways of God's undeserved grace and mercy to his most worthless children!

It is all-inclusive—"I will be the God of all the families of Israel." It is patient of provocation—notwithstanding all the provocation of the forty years, it conducted Israel finally to rest in Canaan. It has an attractive power which the most obdurate cannot resist. It longs to restore the old joyous confidence and freedom—"thou shalt go forth in the dances of them that make merry." It will never rest till it has broken down misunderstanding and alienation of heart—see how the watchmen on Mount Ephraim proclaim the feasts on Mount Zion. It melts our hearts—"they shall come with weeping." It sets the thirsty by rivers of waters, and the blind and lame in a straight way (9).

Let us magnify the grace of God, as it is disclosed in these glowing words. He will gather and keep with shepherd-care (10); He is stronger than the strong tyrant who has held us so long in bondage (11); He will abundantly satisfy our souls, as with wheat and wine and oil (12); He will keep us fertile as a watered garden amid wastes of sand (12); He will satisfy with goodness (14). How this love breaks us down, with bemoaning and heart-sorrow, with shame and confusion of face (19)!

These words, which were so sweet to the prophet (26), anticipate times yet future, when they will be literally fulfilled; but, in the meanwhile, the new covenant is already established (Heb. viii.), the crown and consummation of the love of God; and each one of us may claim the realization of these precious I wills.

A Forty Years' Record.

IT is Rev. Michael Nachim whose record is thus defined; and it is among his kinsmen of the House of Judah that he has laboured "these forty years." Though he has completed such a long period of service, our friend is yet in possession of all his powers, and still impresses the onlooker by his stately bearing, and the listener by his vigorous preaching. He also remains the same as a man—genial and kind, hearty and sincere.

Mr. Nachim stands well in the esteem of his brethren, and it is not surprising that he enjoys that blessing. With great generosity of spirit he has entered into their varied experiences, being ready to help each and all as occasion has allowed. For ten years he was a member of the missionary staff of the venerable London Society; for the past thirty years he has been connected with the British Society, a younger but highly-esteemed organization. Whether in Continental countries or at the London mission centre, he has been content to do the work of an evangelist and teacher among his people; therein he has found ample scope for energy, and in such ministry he has had great encouragement.

On Friday evening last his friends, with other supporters of the Jewish mission, met at Exeter Hall in token of the interesting anniversary. Colonel Morton, of Mildmay, presided over the proceedings, in which representatives of several societies took part—including Revs. F. L. Denman and G. H. Händler, of the London Society; Messrs. M. S. Bergmann and H. Ehrlich, of the London City Mission; and Mr. I. I. Aschkenasi, a worker who traces his Christian enlightenment to the labours of "Rabbi Nachim," many years ago, in distant Roumania. Revs. A. Sternberg, deputation, and I. Levinson, secretary of the British Society, spoke words of kindly appreciation, and friends from distant places as well as many near at hand who were unavoidably absent, wrote letters warm with loving sympathy.

The more serious business of the evening was the presentation of an illuminated address to Mr. Nachim, in token of high regard and in acknowledgment of his long service and zealous devotion. A purse of money followed—£100; and also kind recognition of the loving ministry of Mrs. Nachim. It was interesting to learn at the close of the meeting, the destination of some at least of the money contained in the purse. Mr. Nachim has long had a desire to visit Jerusalem, and now he sees the way, and handles the means. He hopes soon to take his much-anticipated journey, and trusts that, supported by the prayers of friends at home, he may, both while journeying and while staying in the Holy City, testify for Christ among the Jewish people.

Acknowledging the kindness of his brethren and friends, Mr. Nachim was careful to explain that this incident is not to be regarded as the end of his missionary career; he hopes while life lasts to continue to work for Christ among his brethren. In the course of a brief address, he remarked upon the change of temper and attitude on the part of leaders in Israel. What does it mean that a writer in the Jewish Chronicle should ask for kindly treatment of Christian Hebrews? It is indeed marvellous to read that Jews of standing "do not hate the apostate because he has changed his religious views, but rather because his heart is changed towards his brethren!" With Christ in the heart, as Mr. Nachim observed, the worker will negative that explanation of things. Anyhow, there is great promise for the future; younger missionaries will reap what the older workers have sown in tears and sorrow.

Mr. Nachim's address was heard with affectionate attention; and when Mr. Levinson followed with remarks on how the workers among Israel "hang together," and love one another, he was speaking from a text that was well illustrated by the gathering itself. If Jewish workers do sometimes criticise one another, the practice is by no means universal, and plain words are soon followed by hearty co-operation. So it was said; and the meeting cheered the statement, and thus affirmed its beauty and truth. The proceedings began with prayer, and the reading of Psa. cxxxiii. ("Behold how good and how pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity," &c.), and at the close the holy sentiment was a conviction in the hearts of many a gladdened worker for God among Israel.

Romanism as It Is.

I SHOULD like to ask the earnest prayers of God's children on behalf of my friend and myself, who are at present at work in a dark, benighted spot in the west of Ireland.

With the help of a few friends, we have had a movable wooden hall built, and are holding meetings in it. The priest was on the alert from the very commencement, and went about warning the people, telling them he would "excommunicate" them if they came to the meetings. He even told them not to look at us as we passed along the streets of the town. He denounced us in chapel as "false teachers," and told his flock to "flee" from us.

In fact, he seems so to have intimidated both Romanists and Protestants (although there are very few of the latter) that all alike seem terrified to come to the meetings.

Our milk woman has declined to serve us with milk, and not a man in the place could be found to help in the erection of the hall; two promised, but failed, one saying he would be put out of his house if he came!

Oh! these poor priest-ridden, down-trodden people. One's heart aches for them. The priest thinks nothing of knocking them about with a stick if they happen to displease him. And yet it is to this very same Romanism that England is at present truckling, and to which, in spite of all her light and privileges, she is now yielding so fast. It is the Popery that takes away all independence of thought, all freedom of action, and makes men and women the veriest puppets and slaves, degraded and ground down beneath her iron rule. A. M. "A Busy Man's Question."

IN a recent issue, "Onward" asked for suggestions on the important subject of making the best of the evening hour—how to employ a portion of his leisure in a profitable manner in the study of Holy Scripture.

"M. H. S.," writing from Cintra Lodge, Reading, says: "The advice given in Frances Ridley Havergal's booklet, 'One Hour with Jesus' (1d. Partridge & Co.), will form a valuable supplement to the many replies you will doubtless receive. The man of business whose letter Miss Havergal quotes, is still spared to counsel young men, though now in his eighty-sixth year."

The extract from "One Hour with Jesus," reads:—

> The following testimony is from one of England's most successful and eminent men of business. He writes:—
> "In the busy life I have lived, I owe much to the practice of very early rising to secure the 'hour with Jesus' which you recommend. Even now, I find very early rising essential to the maintenance of spiritual life and close communion with God; and being now somewhat weak physically, nothing but the desire for this communion is sufficient to enable me to rise. My wife rises about 6, remaining in her room till 8, or she would not, with her large household, be equal, spiritually, to her duties."

Is not this one of the many new leaves which onward-pressing pilgrims should desire to turn over with the New Year?

"W.B." (West Dulwich) writes:—"The study of the Bible may be viewed from three principal aspects, or, may I say, with three distinct purposes. First, there is the study of the Bible with a view to devotion, and to getting a leading thought from God's Word, of encouragement or education for our day's work. This should be the morning's work, and can easily be accomplished by having recourse to any good selection of daily portions, such as that appearing week by week in The Christian.

"Secondly, it is well to have some definite book or passage of the Bible for special study. It is necessary to become familiar with the text in both the Authorized Version and the Revised Version before having recourse to any commentary or notes. For this study our best intellectual powers are needed, and it may be impossible for a busy man to give a portion of each day to it; but he may, and should, give a part of each week to special study if he really desires to learn of God.

"Thirdly, it is of the greatest importance to do, what I fear many Christians neglect, namely, to read one's Bible through from beginning to end, to get a general view of the whole of God's Word, and see how the various parts harmonize one with the other. This can be done at night after a hard day's work, when, although too weary for special study, the brain is clear enough to read a few chapters and see their general bearing, and to pick up some precious grains of true manna from heaven, but without dwelling on difficulties of interpretation, or on other points requiring close application.

"The late George Müller, in his early years, read his Bible three times every year, and in his later life four times every year, and his testimony is that he never read it without finding some precious treasure that he had previously missed. If any busy man will, in each morning, read a short portion for devotional purposes, and will each evening read a portion of his Bible continuously, and will further take a special subject for study when the occasion permits, he will find hidden treasures of which he has probably hardly dreamed up to the present."

We have received several other communications, but where they deal with the precise question of "Onward," they add little or nothing to the excellent advice given by "W.B."

Chinese Martyrs.

THOMAS, JESSIE, AND WELLESLEY PIGOTT.

By Mr. GEORGE F. TRENCH.

THE subjects of this brief sketch were victims of the massacres in China of last July. In the manner detailed below, these loved servants of Christ passed in to their coronation as martyrs of the Lord Jesus, from T'ai-yuen-fu, smitten by assassin hands.

Born on August 6, 1847, Mr. Pigott was the eldest of the six children of William Wellesley Pole Pigott, by his marriage with Lucy Trench, niece of the first Lord Ashtown. The whole family was in the Lord's service. But two now survive: his youngest brother, the physician of the Dublin Medical Mission, and his sister Mary, some time engaged in mission work at Bloemfontein.

The atmosphere of Mr. Pigott's home at Leixlip, on the richly-wooded bank of the beautiful Liffey, was deeply and actively Christian. While yet little more than a boy he helped his father in his daily labour of presenting Christ to the poorest of the people gathered at his door to receive his charity and hear the message of Salvation.

When the great awakening of 1862 moved mightily Ireland's Midland and Southern provinces, Rye Vale, the Pigotts' home, was thrown open to the preachers, and numbers too large for its space pressed in to hear the truth proclaimed. Tom, who not long before had been led to Christ by a remarkable answer to his boyish prayer, soon became anxious to join in the work of saving souls.

Little did I imagine, when encouraging the young man to speak at a cottage meeting near Dublin in 1868, to what life and death issues that first halting effort would lead. The manly form, the radiant expression, the merry laugh, the deep and overflowing enthusiasm for Christ, marked him for a successful missionary.

If ever a man lived who was utterly in earnest it was Thomas Wellesley Pigott. Whenever he returned to this country from his chosen field of labour, his flowing speech, in private and public, was always and only of China and her people whom he loved so much. It was impossible to remain indifferent or unsympathetic in the presence of such zeal. It wounded his spirit, it grieved him, as something unaccountable, inexplicable, that others should not feel the interest, the sorrow, and the joy with which he was filled. And this was no mere sentiment. It was such a reality that to spend his time, his strength, his mental and physical abilities, and his money freely and wholly in the cause of China was to him the most natural, and for him the only reasonable and possible way to live.

MR. SOWERBY'S NARRATIVE.

Mr. Arthur Sowerby, an intimate friend, and worker in China, writes:—

Twenty years ago, Mr. Pigott, B.A., of Dublin University, with his fine physical development, and possessed of ample means, stood on the threshold of his work in China, where he had come at Christ's bidding to consecrate all he was and had to the Master's cause, and the salvation of the Chinese people.

I recall the first time I met him. I had then only been a few days in China, and I remember his hearty and genial greeting, the warm, brotherly handshake, and the pleasant chat that followed in the sitting-room of the C.I.M. premises at Chefoo.

A few weeks later I was travelling with others across the plain of Chih-li. It was in December, 1881, and we were pressed by circumstances to travel quickly. Mr. Pigott might have joined our party and have enjoyed some pleasant companionship, but it was characteristic of him to prefer loneliness, and to lengthen his journey although the weather was bitterly cold, that he might do some evangelistic work along the road. An intense zeal for the conversion of men was always a marked feature in our brother's character.

Arrived at T'ai-yuen-fu, Mr. Pigott gave himself up to a more thorough study of the Chinese language. He had been in China about two years, but had been travelling with Mr. Cameron in Manchuria, where on one occasion he nearly perished with cold, and his study of Chinese had been much interrupted.

In the spring of 1883, the community of missionaries in T'ai-yuen-fu were alarmed and upset by an attack on Mr. Pigott by a Chinese burglar. The thief had made several robberies from other missionaries, and had secured some dinner knives, including a carving knife from Dr. Schofield. One of the smaller knives he had converted into a saw, and by means of this had effected an entry into the room where Mr. Pigott was sleeping. Mr. Pigott was awakened by the incessant coughing of an elderly man, a Christian evangelist, and rose while it was yet dark to procure some medicine for the sufferer. He discovered the thief under a table, and attempted to secure him. A terrible struggle ensued, in which, although badly wounded, Mr. Pigott obtained the mastery, and the thief was captured. Mr. Pigott then, holding a wet sponge to his bleeding head, ran as hard as his strength would allow, in the early grey of the morning, to Dr. Schofield's house, when his strength gave way. For some weeks he needed the careful nursing and skilful medical attention that was lovingly given him.

About the same time Miss Jessie and Miss Florence Kemp, of Rochdale, arrived in T'ai-yuen-fu. They had left all the attractions of their English home, and of English society, to join in the hard and strenuous work of evangelizing the Chinese. In those days life in the interior of China involved many hardships, and there were but the fewest comforts.

Miss Jessie Kemp had previously been engaged in mission work in India, but had been compelled to leave that field, as her constitution was unfitted to endure the fierce, sultry climate.

Most of the missionaries then resident in T'ai-yuen-fu were fitting themselves for future labours, and Dr. Schofield gave lectures on ophthalmic surgery, with special reference to the treatment of cataract. Miss Jessie Kemp proved herself a most apt pupil, and subsequently many times operated for cataract with marked success.

In 1883 an engagement was entered into between Miss Jessie Kemp and Mr. Pigott, and they were married at Pekin in August of the same year.

In the summer of 1883 Dr. Schofield, to the unspeakable grief of all, was fatally stricken by typhus fever, and Mr. and Mrs. Pigott returned to T'ai-yuen-fu to take up the work from which "the beloved physician" had been removed. Throughout the winter our friends kept both medical and evangelistic work going, and it was remarkable how much Mr. Pigott was able to accomplish alone until the arrival of Dr. E. H. Edwards relieved him of the care of the hospital.

During the next few years Mr. Pigott was largely occupied in the construction of the Schofield Memorial Hospital. By the devotion of time and labour, and by their pecuniary gifts, Mr. and Mrs. Pigott did much to secure the erection of handsome and suitable premises, and thus greatly aided in the valuable work done for so many years in connection with that institution. Only those who were in T'ai-yuen-fu could form any just appreciation of the burdensome and vexatious character of such work, but while struggling with Chinese workmen, evangelistic efforts were never neglected and every endeavour was made to convert the Chinese of all classes.

Mr. and Mrs. Pigott visited England in 1885 and again in 1890, and on their return to China in 1891 were accompanied by other friends, with whom they hoped to form a band of independent labourers. It was thought possible to evangelize the district of Lu-An-Fu, in S.E. Shansi, but unforeseen difficulties arose, and our friends settled at Sheo Yang, eighty miles east of T'ai-yuen-fu. Sheo Yang is a market town of some importance on the main road to Pekin and the coast.

Amidst much opposition, and with many difficulties to encounter, our friends and their colleagues built up a steady work, and brought the light of Christ's Gospel into many homes, and the joy of Christ's peace into many darkened hearts.

In 1898, Mr. and Mrs. Pigott were again able to visit their friends, as it proved, for the last time. Mr. Pigott was anxious to secure a committee in England to assist him in his work at Sheo Yang, but ill-health prevented him from carrying this project into effect. In the autumn of this year, our friends suffered a severe blow, in the tragic death of Miss Ellen Brown, who lost her life by the upsetting of the cart in which she was travelling, into the river. A very dear relative and friend, and most valued colleague, was thus lost to them, and to the work of the Lord.

Last year Mr. and Mrs. Pigott once more returned to China, and after having been for some years crowded in small and unsuitable quarters, they were gratified at being able to obtain some larger and more commodious yards, and were erecting some suitable premises, that were greatly needed. Among other projects our friends were arranging for a school for the children of missionaries in Shansi, and had already had nine other children for a time under their charge. This was a most generous and kind purpose, and promised to be exceedingly useful. The have bereft the Christian Church of two noble and devoted missionaries, and the Chinese have, alas! killed those who were entirely their friends. What exactly they suffered with their governess, Miss Duval, and tutor, Mr. Robinson, both wholly in sympathy with missionary work, and their own dear boy, Wellesley, is perhaps mercifully hidden from our eyes.

It would not do to close these few lines without testifying how kind and good our friends were to the Chinese, and how much loved they were in return. One of our leading evangelists, in no way connected with Mr. Pigott, said: "I do like to hear him preach, he is so full of love." At one of our Chinese Conferences Mr. Pigott gave a most valuable address on the Lord's Second Coming, that was much appreciated by all, while at our Conference held last February in T'ai-yuen-fu, Mr. Pigott preached the sermon on Sunday morning with much power and unction, and Mrs. Pigott took the lead in addressing the women.

Stunned by their loss, we can but humbly bow our heads before God, thankful for lives of such noble devotedness, thankful for their triumphant death, and meekly beseeching that He will comfort their loved ones who remain, and mercifully rebuild the work that has been so cruelly overthrown, so that "the Son of God may yet be manifested" in Sheo Yang, to destroy the works of the devil, and deliver them who have for ages been subject to his bondage."

Both Mr. and Mrs. Pigott had been, during the earlier portion of their life in China, in connection with the China Inland Mission, and although subsequently, as Mr. Sowerby has stated, preferring to found a Mission on independent lines, continued to the end of their lives in hearty sympathy with that noble association. In 1896, Mr. Pigott wrote of the C.I.M. as "a mission which we love," and said: "We and they (Dr. and Mrs. Edwards) shall always desire to help in every way the old work, and only regret the causes which have led to severance of the bonds of organization—not of Christian fellowship and co-operation, if we can help it."

MISS SHEKLETON'S NARRATIVE.

The following record of events is from the pen of Miss Shekleton, who returned to England early in the present year:—

Here in this mountain district of Sheo Yang, where the name of Jesus was unknown, and where at least sixty per cent. of girl babies were destroyed without remorse, Mr. and Mrs. Pigott settled down with a few co-workers for the last period of their missionary life. Here, with a parish to each worker of some 100,000 souls, a work of God was begun, which during eight years of devoted labour was marked by very manifest spiritual blessing.

"The converts came in slowly; they were for the most part of the sturdy yeoman type, and they proved staunch and true in the face of much opposition. Many would put workers at home to shame by the earnestness with which, in season and out of season, they preached the glorious Gospel of Christ.

One of these converts, a man called Li-pai, had bought a Gospel of Luke from Mr. Pigott on one of his former preaching tours. He had in consequence given up idol worship, but had not met a missionary to speak to till one day, when Mr. and Mrs. Pigott were visiting in a village and speaking to the people, this man drew from his breast the precious Gospel, carefully wrapped up, eagerly saying, "I read about Jesus in this book. He was a wonderful man and did great works. Who was He? Why did they kill Him?" Mr. Pigott had after this many talks with the shepherd, for such he was, and step by step he was led on to know the Lord, and BORE BRAVE WITNESS FOR CHRIST.

In every village where he stayed groups of country folk from all sides gathered round to hear the Word of Life. "What new thing is this?" they said, "What has this shepherd found that he should know more of God than our wise men or scholars know?" Thus one by one converts were gathered in and an earnest little Church was built up, while Mrs. Pigott toiled among the women of the villages; slow and difficult work, so degraded were they, and so dulled their intellects, yet among them also souls were won for Christ.

Mr. Pigott wrote in 1897: "The door is now set wide open in the providence of God. Who can tell how long it may be so? 'Work while it is day, for the night cometh when no man can work.'" Three more years of faithful work for God, and the voices that had so long proclaimed the love of the Saviour of sinners were to be silenced on earth—the good fight was fought, the course was finished, and they, with many more beloved servants of Christ, were called to receive their crown and to share in the joy of their Lord.

The Church of Christ has been startled and dismayed during the last few months by terrible reports of bloodshed and massacre in North China—reports repeated and confirmed as the weeks went on, until at last we wake up as from a nightmare to realize that at least a hundred of Christ's faithful missionaries have suffered torture and death at their posts of duty, as well as many delicate women and little children, that the Christian Church of North China, numbering a thousand converts in one province alone has been swept away, and that the few who are left inland are suffering terrible persecution with none to counsel or help.

Yü Hsien, the infamous governor of the province of Shan-si, since reported to have died by his own hand, sought, during June, July, and August, to work his wicked will among the many stations of that province, seeking with tigerish ferocity to exterminate Christianity. Backed by a murderous edict of the Empress Dowager, missionaries were massacred in their stations, or clubbed from city to city, starving, half naked, some dropping with exhaustion to die on the roadside, some struggling on in utter weakness, yet never a word of murmur nor of anything but love to the people for whom their lives had been given.

In T'ai-yuen-fu, a city from which Sheo Yang was distant two days' journey, the most terrible tragedy of all was enacted. On June 27, the mob made a furious attack on the large hospital and mission premises belonging to Dr. Edwards, which was burnt down, one devoted lady-worker, Miss Coombs, of Birmingham, being thrown in the flames during her efforts to save an invalid child. The other workers were restricted to the B.M.S. premises, where thirty-three made a last stand for more than a week, until trapped into the governor's yamen.

In the meantime, Yü Hsien, determined that none should escape, sent soldiers to Sheo Yang. Here Mr. and Mrs. Pigott were seized, laden with iron collars and chains and brought in carts to the capital. According to what seem trustworthy reports, they were taken to the Governor's yamen, and there found the whole missionary band

ASSEMBLED FOR EXECUTION.

The next day—according to one report, the same day—all were called into the court of the yamen. Here, after the governor had reviled them with insulting language, the Boxers, of whom a large body were present, wearing red turbans, received the word of command. They rushed forward and put the whole party to the sword, all behaving with a courage that astonished their executioners. After the sad scene was over, the bodies of these dear martyrs of Christ were thrown outside the west gate of the city, but some native Christians went out nobly, at the risk of their lives, and buried them, only to perish themselves three days afterwards in a general massacre of Christians. It is even said that horsemen were sent out to hunt up all who might be in hiding, and there can be few left alive to tell the tale, so dark, and yet so bright and glorious.

Both of these devoted workers were deeply absorbed in their work of soul-winning, and never lost an opportunity of speaking for Christ, often in much weariness and weakness of body. They had laid themselves and their means on the altar of consecration to God; and their son Wellesley was following in their steps. He began last December teaching a class of Chinese boys in Sunday school. A little while before going back to China, he said: "We can't be martyrs in England, but my father and mother and I might be in China." It was a remarkable forecast, and was shared by his mother, who, after the Ku-chêng massacre, wrote: "It makes one feel how short our time for work in this land may be, and long to be more filled with God's Holy Spirit, that we may be faithful to the end." And again, "If God's infinite grace is to conform us to the image of his Son, may it not be that in our work for Him, we may need to know something of what He suffered?"

Mr. Stanley Smith writes: "Though my acquaintance with Mr. and Mrs. Pigott was not of long duration, their force of character has left very distinct impressions on my mind. Mr. Pigott was as generous and large hearted as Mrs. Pigott was capable and courageous. Their love to the Chinese was a characteristic which showed itself as soon as you knew them."

Nothing would, I am convinced, have been more distasteful to these loved friends than the idea that anything should be written for their exaltation. The foregoing record is not to be taken in that way. I know of no one to whom more than to them the words of St. Paul applied —"according to my earnest expectation and hope that in nothing I shall be put to shame, but that with all boldness, as always, so now also Christ shall be magnified in my body, whether by life or by death. For to me to live is Christ, and to die is gain" "I hold not my life dear unto myself, so that I may accomplish my course and the ministry which I received from the Lord Jesus, to testify the Gospel of the grace of God."

Where lives of such entire consecration to God and love to souls are given, the crown of martyrdom may be said to be their fitting climax and glory

Industrial Missions' Aid Society.

THE second annual meeting of the Industrial Missions' Aid Society was held at Exeter Hall on Wednesday afternoon of last week. The object of this organization is to develop the industrial element in missionary operations, by associating agricultural and other employment with the ordinary work of foreign missions. Although in its infancy, the Society has already substantiated its claim to the support of Christians at home, by the useful service it has rendered in the foreign field. The work of the year has consisted chiefly in developing the Society's industries in India, particularly that of the carpet factory at Ahmednagar. Nearly two hundred hands are now permanently employed. The present buildings having become quite insufficient for the needs of the business, is now to be erected. The directors are also contemplating improvements and developments at Nasik. Industrial operations have been commenced at Cuzco, in the Republic of Peru. £500 have been provided by the Society to assist the effort, the repayment of which, with interest, has been secured. Applications for assistance on behalf of industrial enterprises have been received from many parts of the mission field, including one from Frere Town, where it is proposed to commence brick and tile making, carpentry, &c.

A NEW FACTORY

Prebendary Webb-Peploe presided over the gathering. He cordially commended the Society's efforts, and said he could not imagine an organization which was needed more, or one which would lead up to greater and more beneficial results. He pointed out that the society comes forward to ask people to invest their money in in the mission field. After payment of interest to investors, the income and property of the association are applied solely to the promotion of its objects. The Chairman added that he was glad to know that while they paid attention to the business and commercial side of the scheme, the religious aspect of the work was kept well to the front. They were anxious that those who came into their workshops, while being instructed in some useful trade, should at the same time be taught something of the Gospel of the Lord Jesus Christ.

Rev. R. Wardlaw Thompson spoke from observation and experience of the great need of industrial missions. Missionary societies are realizing that it is of the utmost importance that, while they take the Gospel to the heathen natives, they should educate them in various forms of manual labour, in order that they could work side by side with the missionaries. Bishop Peel, of Mombasa, expressed his strong confidence in the aims of the society. For eighteen years he had been facing the problem what to do for the converts to Christianity. Sir C. R. Lighton and Mr. R. Laidlaw, two of the directors, added a few words as to the prospects of the society, and urged the need of the organization for removing from missionaries the burden of finding employment for converts.

Reaching the Kabyles.—During a recent tour in Kabylia, Mr. E. Cuendet had many opportunities for preaching and distributing the Gospels among the natives, who gladly accepted the missionary and his message. One boy, to whom a portion of the Scriptures was given, was found the next day reading it to a number of men. Among the tribe of the Oudia the traveller preached in five villages, never before visited by Protestant missionaries. The people listened to the Word with earnest attention, and exclaimed, "You ought to go to all the villages of Kabylia to tell the good news you have told us." Mr. Cuendet, whose address is 35, Rue Dupuch, Algiers, hopes to repeat his visits more often to the Kabyles in their villages and mountain homes.

British Syrian Mission.

THE annual and valedictory meeting of the British Syrian Mission was recently held in Lower Exeter Hall. Miss Thompson, hon. supt. of the work in Syria, was present, and the gathering was largely attended.

Miss Talbot, from Ainzahalta, Mount Lebanon, spoke of the Druses being reached largely through school and medical work. House-to-house visitation is also much valued by the people. Mr. Maynard, who, in the course of a recent visit to Syria, saw the work in Beyrout and other places, spoke warmly of its usefulness and spirituality.

Miss Thompson referred to the hindrances to steady evangelical work in Syria, the most prominent being the opposition of Jesuits and Maronites and the constant emigration. She concluded, "Children are often the means of the conversion of adults, and the thousands of young people who learn to follow Christ in our schools are doing more to lift the darkness of Mohammedanism and superstition from the land than all outside missionary effort."

Rev. H. E. Fox, speaking from the chair, addressed the ladies who are proceeding to Syria, bidding each God-speed. The speaker went on to remind his hearers that those who are connected with missionary work need to remember that they walk by faith and not by sight; by faith, not in an organization, but in God. Mr. Fox expressed the opinion that few missionary fields present so many difficulties as Syria and Palestine. The address concluded with some helpful words on "giving." "God is able to make all grace abound toward you, that ye, having all sufficiency in all things, may abound unto every good work." This passage refers to the grace of all kinds of giving. The workers about to leave are giving themselves. We can all give more than we do—more prayer, more money, more information—and this grace is given us in order to be exercised. Relying on Him, abiding in Him, we have an all-sufficient supply. The office address of the Mission is 29A, High Street, Wimbledon, S.W.

Zanzibar Strangers' Rest.

MANY readers of The Christian are interested in this Mission, and will no doubt be pleased to hear of the special opportunities of service that our missionaries there have had recently.

Very good meetings amongst the sailors had been held for some weeks, but on one Sunday, no man-of-war being in the harbour, Mr. and Mrs. Knapman were preparing to have a busy day amongst the Swahili, when news reached them that a large transport ship had arrived, carrying 500 troops bound for Natal. Their plans were immediately changed, and they went on board to arrange for a service. Permission was willingly granted by the colonel, as well as the captain of the ship, who gave them use of the poop-deck, where over 300 soldiers were gathered to hear "the old, old story;" the meeting lasted for over two hours, the men joining in the singing very heartily, and showing the greatest attention. Several expressed their desire to follow Jesus. The vessel left on the following day, each man taking with him a copy of the Illustrated Gospels and Stirling "Penny Stories."

The following Sunday, Commissioner Railton paid them a visit, and spoke at native services, and to the sailors in the evening. Three missionaries from the C.M.S. have recently visited the Rest, and given much cheer to our helpers as well as assistance in the Mission. It has always been our desire to make the Rest a blessing to the many Christian friends who are so frequently passing through Zanzibar, and we are thankful it is so much appreciated by them. At the farewell reception given to Sir Arthur and Lady Hardinge, just before they left the island, Sir Arthur, in his speech, said: "I would not be doing my duty if I did not mention the excellent institution presided over by Mr. and Mrs. Knapman, and I must say that the Missions here have never given me any trouble, but have been of the greatest help and support." We think this testimony from the Queen's representative, after some years' residence there, is very gratifying.

Another helper will be required to go out to Zanzibar next year, and I shall be glad to correspond with any who feel that God would have them to serve Him at Zanzibar.

Indian Women.

WRITING as an opponent of State Regulation of Vice, Dr. Helen M. Wilson calls attention to the proposed erection of a voluntary Lock Hospital at Ludhiana, in North India. The hospital is to be worked in connection with the North India School of Medicine for Christian Women, at Ludhiana. The "Refuge Ward," as the new building will be called, is to be on a piece of land adjoining the present hospital buildings. The initial sum required is £600, and the annual income necessary would be £150.

The scheme has the earnest support of Mrs. Andrew and Dr. Kate Bushnell. The hospital will be under the charge of Dr. Edith Brown, who is an ardent anti-regulationist. Efforts will be made to induce and enable patients to turn from evil ways and earn an honest livelihood. The poor women for whom the ward is intended are excluded from ordinary hospitals. Most of them are poor girls or friendless Hindu widows who have been led astray, or sold for immoral purposes. Hitherto the only provision for them has been in the Government cantonment hospitals. These are worked on a compulsory system, and are only for women living in the cantonments. Dr. Wilson's address is 381, Glossop Road, Sheffield.

Darjeeling Memorial Hall.

AT the beginning of the present year a committee was formed to raise funds for a Sunday School Hall in connection with the Union Church, Darjeeling, as a Memorial to the European and American children who lost their lives in the great storm of September 24 and 25, 1899.

It will be remembered that on the night of the disaster some of the children gave evidence of a beautiful trust in God, even in the hour of deepest darkness, and when brought face to face with sudden death. They were all members of the Union Church Sunday-School, a fact which renders it eminently appropriate that the Memorial should take the form of a hall for Sunday-School purposes, to be called "The Children's Memorial Sunday-School Hall"; the more so that the children whose memory is to be perpetuated were themselves at the time actively interested in a project for such a building.

The work of the school for which the building is required is pan-denominational in character, the teachers who labour in connection with it from time to time being members of Evangelical denominations; and it is the only organized Sunday school for European children in Darjeeling. Hence the Memorial will meet a public need, a need which is all the greater because Darjeeling is being increasingly recognised as a sanatorium for children and a centre for their education.

It is estimated that a suitable hall can be built and furnished for 10,000 rupees, and a general committee has been formed in order to carry out the scheme, consisting of:—Mr. A. Earle, Deputy Commissioner of Darjeeling; the Hon. J. A. Bourdillon, C.S.I.; Mr. R. T. Greer, Inspector-General of Police, and other friends.

San Remo.

THE church of St. John the Baptist at San Remo was burned down last winter, when the large congregation were looking forward to a season of useful service under the esteemed chaplain, Rev. Reginald Fawkes. A new building has now been commenced. It will be somewhat larger and more conveniently situated than the former church. A sum of £3,000 is required to meet the outlay. Miss Macdonald Lockhart, Villa Teresa, San Remo, who sends the above particulars, adds:—"Many who have known the church in old days, and who recognize its sphere of blessing not only in its own immediate work, but as a bond of union between Christians, may like to help in maintaining this Evangelical centre. Messrs. Barclay, Bevan, Tritton, and Co., 54, Lombard Street, have opened an account for the 'St. John the Baptist Fund,'"

A Chicago Rescue Mission.

IT is a pleasure to note the continued success and further development of the Pacific Garden Mission, Chicago. Whether in the heat of summer or the intense cold of winter, large crowds have found their way to this centre of religious activity, and many an aimless, weary wanderer has been encouraged and cheered; while thousands have realized the fulness and depth of Divine grace. The mission is located in what is known as the notorious "levie" district, where saloons, gambling houses, dens of iniquity and vice abound. An open-air service at the door precedes the evening meeting, and to the surging throng of passers-by a cordial invitation to enter the hall is given. An opportunity is given for requests for prayer, and at the outset of the service many are often seen bowing in penitence. From every quarter come tidings of converts who are now engaged as ministers, evangelists, etc., and are working

IN DISTANT SPHERES.

Among the prisoners much lasting good has been accomplished, and many will praise God that their unfortunate experiences were overruled for their eternal benefit. A useful medium for reaching those who will enter neither church nor mission hall, but throng the public thoroughfare, is the Gospel waggon. The accompaniment of organ and cornet form the signal of its arrival, and an audience of from three to five hundred often gather and listen with spell-bound interest to the stirring testimony of those engaged in proclaiming the Gospel.

Another significant feature of the mission is the circulating library. By means of this are annually placed in homes where the Word of God had never been known. Another department is the Crime Preventing Agency, which is accomplishing more in preserving peace by its restraining influence upon those who would otherwise be a prey upon the public, and so protecting the interest to a greater degree, than can be well estimated.

The superintendent is Mrs. Sarah D. Clarke, 100, East Van Buren Street, Chicago.

From Dr. Baedeker.

WRITING from Vienna on November 20, Dr. Baedeker says:—

"I arrived here this morning from Frankfort, after having had full and profitable days at Strasburg, Baden-Baden, and Wiesbaden. Pastor and Mrs. Ziemendorff at Wiesbaden have gathered around themselves a number of workers, who search the land to find out the needy places, of which there is no lack. They have turned their house into a busy beehive, several volunteer lady workers uniting with them. They had invited me for some days to visit prisons which, by special favour, had been opened for them by the legal authorities, on condition that only Protestant prisoners were to be spoken to. As the prisoners, however, were not gathered in the church, the restrictions were not observed, and all had New Testaments given them.

"My intention is to go to Russia once more, but I may spend more time in Prague and Budapest with Slovaks, Hungarians and Czechs. Three poor exiled Stundist families having settled at Aitos, in Bulgaria, have been uprooted again through malarial fever. I was very grateful, by some timely gift, to be able to help them. The same post which informed me of their sad condition brought me also some gifts to meet their urgent need. They had to leave Aitos and seek a home elsewhere in Bulgaria and Roumania. I hope there will be happy release found. These brave witnesses are true to their faith under much opposition and difficulties. I shall hope to remain here about a week."

The Sailor's New Testament.

THE Soldier's New Testament, issued by the Scripture Gift Mission, has gone far and wide; into thousands of knapsacks it has been given a place, and men of all ranks have read it, and noted the preface in which Field-Marshal Lord Wolseley says that the soldier who possesses such a book will have "something of far greater value to him than the proverbial marshal's bâton."

Now we have a corresponding book for circulation among the marine forces. The internal features are the same as the singularly beautiful Soldier's book; the cover displays a design emphatically patriotic, distinctively nautical—the central object being a British ironclad, set in symbols of world-wide interest. There is a neat little inscription by Admiral Sir F. Leopold McClintock, in which we read: "Our ancient mariners were devout, God-fearing men, guiding their actions by God's Word as carefully as they steered their ships by the compass. Let us, sailors of to-day, also take the Bible as our compass through life, and God will guide us with his counsel, and finally bring us to the haven where we would be."

There are fifty pictures in this little book, which is sure to be widely disseminated by workers among our sailors. Those who would help in this may learn particulars from Mr. W. Walters, office of the Scripture Gift Mission, 15, Strand, W.C. We understand that specimen copies of the book may be had for 7d., post free.

Notes from Victoria.

FOR the last two days the Melbourne daily papers have been interesting reading. Monday's issue contained a lengthy report of the Roman Catholic Archbishop's sermon upon Bible teaching in State schools. He opposes the lessons agreed upon by fourteen ministers, representing the Protestant Christian Churches of Victoria, although these lessons are designed only for those willing to receive them, and may be declined by Roman Catholics. The professed ground of his objection is, that the lessons are "sectarian" and "Protestant." That they are not the first is proved by the fact that all the non-Romanist Churches are agreed upon them; and if they are the second, that is only because the Bible is a Protestant book. The fight has fairly begun; and it is hoped that all Protestants will contend vigorously for the adoption of these lessons, and so enable the Colony to begin the new century with a State education in which the Word of God is recognised.

In the Church of England, too, the Romanist controversy has begun. Friends of true Protestantism will rejoice in the fact that at the Church Assembly on Monday, a resolution condemnatory of Ritualism was carried by eighty-nine votes against eighty-six. The terms of the resolution declared "the Romanizing movement in the Church of England" to be "a source of danger to this diocese," and that "special vigilance" was needed to guard against it.

The Victorian Christian Endeavour Convention has just been held in Melbourne, and has been characterized by great enthusiasm. At the large meeting held in the Town Hall on Monday, Professor Harper dealt with the weak spot in the life of the Australian young men, which he described as "the idolatry of sport." His statement is significant, and may be accepted as fairly accurate:—"About thirty young people in one hundred read books worth reading which stimulate thought, and of these twenty are girls; while at every lecture of an educational character there are two women to one man." It is not only at church services and in Endeavour Societies that there is occasion to mourn the lack of young men.

If any of my old friends desire news of myself I am thankful to say that I continue in excellent health, and am enjoying a measure of God's blessing upon my work. GEO. WAINWRIGHT.

Geelong, Vic., October 10.

Uganda.—Many have been in anxiety respecting the fate of missionaries in Uganda on account of the failure of mails. The Church Missionary Society having inquired at the Foreign Office if any information were available, Lord Salisbury has replied that disturbances in the Nandi country, which lies near Ugowe Bay, where the railway is to strike the Lake, are the cause of the present interruption of the mail service. His lordship adds that it is expected that the disturbed district will soon be tranquilized, and entertains no anxiety as to the safety of Europeans in Uganda

Irish Notes.

THE Sabbath School Society for Ireland has charge of 7,500 officers and teachers, and 84,000 scholars. It supplies these with various kinds of literature, and is carrying on an excellent work.

The Ulster Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals is offering a large number of prizes to boys and girls in the day schools for the best brief essays on kindness to animals. It did the same thing last year, and received no fewer than 700 essays.

There are thirty-three Protestant Orphan Societies in Ireland at present, and all are doing a good work. They have about 2,700 children under their care, and their gross income last year was £20,345. During the thirty-five years the Londonderry Orphan Society has been in existence, 415 orphans have been upon its books, and of these only fifteen died while under the care of the Society. A sum of £2,000 is now being raised as a reserve fund of this Society.

On his retiring from the active duties of the Methodist ministry after forty-seven years' service, Rev. William Gorman has been presented with a villa, rent free, as a residence at a cost of about £800. Mr. Gorman is a remarkable preacher, and this provision for his old age was contributed to by Baptists, Congregationalists, and Episcopalians, as well as by Methodists. Professor Whitla, M.A., took the leading part in organizing the matter, and no other Methodist preacher in Ireland ever received any such gift on his retiring from active service.

The Presbyterian Church has suffered a serious loss in the death of Rev. Dr. Cargin, minister of the first Presbyterian Church, Londonderry, who died in Belfast after two or three days' illness. Before going to Derry Dr. Cargin had been minister successively of Tullylish, and of Ormond Quay, Dublin. He was just after having a remarkable mission in his church, which was conducted by Rev. John McNeill, and he preached with his usual vigour in St. Enoch's Church, Belfast, on the 11th inst. He was an earnest and devoted minister and pastor—his unexpected death is greatly regretted by all who knew him.

It is thought that in a short time there will be a serious lack of ministerial candidates in the Irish Presbyterian Church, and this is attributed to three causes, namely, the law of reaction, by which a surplus is often changed into a deficiency, the difficulty of examinations, and the small remuneration of most ministers. There are now only 117 students in the two Irish Presbyterian colleges, but to meet the demands of the immediate future it is urged that there should be at least 145, and it is also urged that it should be made possible for converted young men to enter the ministry without having to spend so long a period as ten years, which they have to do at present, in passing examinations and in preparing for it.

The Roman Catholic bishops have altered their demands with regard to the university question. Instead of asking for a university entirely to themselves they now say they will be satisfied with a great National University to which all denominations can have access, and at which all would be paid according to results. It is presumed this would mean the taking of its charter from Trinity College, and the reducing of the latter to the level of one of the Queen's Colleges. It would also mean the establishing of an examining board with the power of granting degrees, but without any facilities for teaching. Already, however, the country has such an institution in the Royal University. Of course Trinity College, Dublin, has the power of granting degrees, and to deprive it of this privilege, and also, if possible, of some of its endowments, seems to be the object of the change of front referred to. Indeed, as regards opportunity for university education, the Roman Catholics of Ireland, with the richly endowed college of Maynooth, and half the fellowships of the Royal University in their hands, besides possessing the very same rights in Trinity College, Dublin, as those of any other church, have in reality nothing to complain of. As they stand at present, they have more than equality and yet they are not satisfied. Their great anxiety appears to be to keep their youth both in school and college as far apart as possible from the youth of Protestantism, and thus they want to keep their people in the dark, and they tacitly acknowledge that their system is such a feeble thing it cannot bear to come into competition on equal terms with that of other churches.

Highbury Corner Gospel Mission.—At the open-air meetings at Highbury Fields, London, N., the meetings for both children and adults have been even larger and more interesting than those of previous years. The members of the Mission during the winter months will, as usual, render help to missions, schools, &c., by giving special illustrated Bible addresses, and Oriental lectures. The Hon. Sec. is Mr. J. Horne, 42, Compton Road, London, N.

Welsh Notes.

THE Swansea Free Church Council has issued a manifesto on the observance of the Sabbath. The manifesto declares that there is an increasing tendency, in the district represented by the Council, to change the Sabbath from being a holy day of rest into a day of labour for some and of pleasure for others. It is a regrettable fact that even in religious Wales Sabbath desecration is on the increase.

It appears that something like a Temperance revival is taking place in North Wales. The Good Templars are especially active, and are opening lodges in various parts of the country. In Anglesey the Calvinistic Methodists have been asked to permit the formation of junior lodges in connection with each of their churches.

The Welsh Christian Endeavourers of Liverpool have just held their annual Conference. Various indications go to show that the Welsh section of the Christian Endeavour movement in Liverpool is in a healthy and vigorous condition. The meetings were addressed by some well-known ministers, and also by Mr. Samuel Smith, M.P.

A well-known Welsh Congregational minister in Glamorganshire has passed away in the person of Rev. M. C. Morris, of Ton, Rhondda Valley. Mr. Morris had been stationed in the Rhondda Valley for some fifteen years. In addition to his gifts as a preacher, he was an essay-writer who had won considerable success in Eisteddfodic competitions.

Rev. J. Hughes, of Tanygrisian, honorary secretary of the Free Church Council at Blaenau Ffestiniog, in North Wales, has addressed a letter to all the Nonconformist Churches of the district on behalf of the Council, asking them to discountenance theatre-going, on the ground that many of the plays performed are injurious to the morals of those who see them performed.

It is sometimes asserted that the statistics of membership and attendance furnished by some of the evangelical bodies of the Principality are not reliable. A proposal which may be put into practice by the Calvinist Methodists of North Wales will remove this reproach. The plan suggested is that adherents shall be registered with the same care as is now shown in the tabulation of church members.

Although numerically the weakest of the four Nonconformist bodies of the Principality, the Welsh Wesleyans are showing considerable activity in connection with the Million Guineas Fund. In the Wrexham district alone it is hoped to collect from 750 to 1,000 guineas. Towards the object a meeting was held on Friday, November 16, when Mr. Percy Bunting was the chief speaker.

The organ of one of the leading Nonconformist bodies in the Principality has drawn attention to the excellent work done by the Welsh agents of the London City Mission amongst their fellow-countrymen in the metropolis, points out the fact that the greater part of the financial support accorded by Welsh churches to the Mission is furnished by one denomination. This is a pity, as the work of the City Mission is undenominational, and churches of all denominations benefit by its operations.

It is to be regretted that there are indications of little interest among the Free Churches of the Principality in the Simultaneous Mission proposed to be held under the auspices of the National Free Church Council throughout the kingdom in February next. Surely it is time that the provincialism of Welsh religion should disappear, and that the "land of revivals" should co-operate heartily in a movement so eminently Christian in its aims as the proposed mission.

One of the most important churches in the Welsh Congregational body is now celebrating its centenary. The church owes its inception to some Welsh emigrants who, in the year 1800, set sail for the United States, but who were obliged to put back owing to stress of weather. They thereupon settled down in Liverpool and founded the church which is known as Tabernacle Church, Netherfield Road, Liverpool. Among its ministers have been men of such distinguished standing and power as Revs. Dr. John Thomas and William Rees—the latter known throughout Wales not only as preacher but also as poet and hymn-writer.

The death of Rev. William Williams, of Swansea, removes one of the most distinguished of the ministers of the Welsh Calvinistic Methodist body. Since 1873 Mr. Williams had been pastor of Argyle Calvinistic Methodist Church. Previous to this he had held pastorates at Penclawdd, Gower; Bethany, Swansea; and Crickhowell, in Breconshire. In Swansea he was held in high esteem, and throughout the country his fame was in all the churches. In 1875 Mr. Williams filled the office of Moderator of the Calvinistic Methodist General Assembly. As a writer he achieved considerable distinction by his history of Welsh Calvinistic Methodism. At the time of his death the deceased minister was eighty-three years of age.

Scottish Notes.

THE Scottish Reformer publishes an interesting list of forty-eight Scottish burghs of which the provosts or lord provosts are total abstainers.

Mr. L. J. Greenberg has been on a visit to Scotland in the interests of the English Zionist Federation. He found the Jewish community strikingly apathetic on the question. In Glasgow, for instance, out of 5,000 Jews, not more than 160 are prepared to identify themselves with the movement.

The question of the provision of separate religious instruction for the children of Episcopalians is being forced to the front at Maryhill. A vigorously worded protest has been sent to the School Board "against the intolerant action of the Presbyterian members in refusing to Episcopalian children their right to receive religious instruction from an accredited representative of their own communion;" and the threat is held out that at next election the whole subject will be brought before the ratepayers.

Much pain has been caused in the minds of many in the United Free Church through the action of the Free Church ministers and congregations who have felt it necessary to stand aloof. Dr. Ross Taylor expressed the mind of others beside himself when he said at Inverness last week that the "dissentient" appeared to have made a serious mistake in the view they took of the documents issued by the Union Committee. Dr. Howie has assured Rev. Murdo Mackenzie, in an "open letter," of the earnest prayer of the United Church that the parting may be only for a little while; and the report of a meeting of the Free North congregation, Inverness, held on the same day on which Dr. Howie wrote, gives reason to hope that the prayer may be realized.

Services were held last week in commemoration of the seventeenth anniversary of the evangelistic work in Cowcaddens Free Church, Glasgow. Rev. William Ross testified to the loyalty and devotion of the band of workers with whose help the meetings had been carried on for 6,236 evenings without a single break. A debt of £6,014 has long since been cleared off the buildings, 4,000 persons have been received into the fellowship of the Church, 40,000 have taken temperance pledges, and 45,000 have been ministered to in the medical department. The meetings were larger than have been seen at any former anniversary. Good hope is entertained that the vacancy in the junior pastorate of the congregation will soon be filled up.

"A week in the slums and what I saw there," was the subject of a stirring address given to his congregation last week by Rev. A. J. Forson, of Morison Church, Dundee. The slum referred to was their own mission district, as allocated by the Home Mission Union; and he declared frankly that he did not believe his hearers had any idea of the depths of misery and foul sinks of wretchedness that abound within that area. Pointing to what had been accomplished in another neighbourhood—the Greenmarket—he said the same might be done in the Scouringburn and the wynds round their own door. When appealing for volunteers for a new crusade, he said he was done in the meantime with discussing the reasons why men and women go to live in the slums: "When we see a man drowning, we do not waste time discussing how he got into the water."

The report of the Dundee Sabbath School Union, presented last week, is another disappointing document, indeed it was said at the meeting that the reporting of decreases threatens to become chronic. The fact that the falling off is mainly in mission schools does not reassure those who are concerned about this subject, but rather gives reason for more serious anxiety. The directors are of opinion that the adoption of uniform hours of worship in the churches would at least do something to remedy the state of matters, by enabling a definite part of the Lord's Day to be set aside for work among the young. The figures show that the seventy-one schools have 1,203 teachers, a decrease of thirty-six. The scholars number 11,775, with an average attendance of 9,358, the decreases for this year being respectively 352 and 186.

An animated discussion took place last week at a meeting of Dundee School Board over two applications for licences to enable children of between seven and eleven years to appear on the stage. One was for a particular child to appear in "The Sorrows of Satan," the fact being mentioned as an extenuation that she would be "killed" early in the performance, and thus be able to get home before ten o'clock. The granting of the desired permission was formally moved by Canon Holder (R.C.), and was ultimately passed, though only by the casting vote of the chairman. The example of granting was followed in the second case, but we are glad to note such a change in public opinion that we may hope soon to see such applications refused. We shall probably find then that theatrical managers are perfectly well aware of other arrangements which they can make in such cases, the only real drawback being additional expense.

The Y.M.C.A.

THE Newcastle-on-Tyne Association, in its handsome new building, has made an excellent beginning of the winter's work. Four hundred and fifty new members have been received. The Bible class average attendance is 200, and the P.S.A. 250.

At the Taunton Association anniversary a Bible reading was given in the afternoon by Mr. George Clarke, and after tea, over a thousand people attended the annual meeting. Addresses were given by the president, Mr. J. E. W. Wakefield and Mr. Clarke.

The Lancaster Association, which has just removed into new and well-adapted rooms, convened for the 21st inst. a conference of young men from the surrounding district, following the Y.M.C.A. week of prayer. Among those who took part in the proceedings, which were enthusiastic and helpful in character, were Mr. Norval W. Helme, M.P., Rev. Thos. Champness, and Mr. A. K. Yapp, travelling secretary for Lancashire.

The president of the Sunderland Association, Mr. Arthur Backhouse, recently gave a reception, at which Rev. D. Callum, who has recently returned from China, delivered an acceptable talk upon missionary work, and Mr. Hy. Armstrong, general secretary of the Newcastle Association, also spoke. The Mission Band of the Sunderland Association has held a ten days' mission at Deptford, near Sunderland, and much good accrued from the services.

The winter session of the St. Helens Association was recently inaugurated at a large and representative gathering. Addresses were given by Rev. Canon Willink, Col. Pilkington, Mr. A. K. Yapp, and other friends. The Association is taking an active part in a simultaneous mission whibh is being held in the town. The evangelist at the Y.M.C.A. is Mr. George Clarke. After the conclusion of the mission, an effort is to be made to secure new premises for the Association.

The Colonial Mission of Mr. W. M. Oatts, representing the English Council, continues to arouse interest and sympathy in Australia. His visit to Brisbane lasted a fortnight, during which time he conducted forty services. One of the most interesting of these took place in the Botanic Gardens. The addresses were delivered from a ferry punt on the lake, and the audience of 1,000 persons was seated on the banks. The local association has derived great benefit from Mr. Oatts's co-operation.

The Week of Prayer was largely observed by Associations all over the country; and many hundreds of special sermons to young men were preached in connection therewith from the pulpit of all evangelical denominations. The topics selected by the International Committee in Geneva, based upon the words "one thing" in their various Scriptural connections, found much acceptance, and a large number of successful meetings are reported. Mr. R. D. Pringle, from Bombay, has visited many Associations, in which there has been a considerable awakening of missionary interest in behalf of young men in foreign countries.

Last Thursday evening, at Kilburn Hall, Mr. F. A. Bevan presided at the annual gathering of the Kilburn Association. The report of the secretary (Mr. Golden) showed that the attendance at the various meetings was larger than had been the case for several years; believers had received much definite blessing; while many young men had been brought to a saving knowledge of Christ. The Chairman spoke of the advantages of such an association to young men and others. Dr. Monro Gibson, in a telling and interesting address, pressed the question, "How are you getting on?" in its application to the character and spiritual life of the men; while Rev. Graham Thwaites urged the absolute reliability of the Word of God, from Genesis to Revelation, showing that the secret of true strength was having the Word of God abiding in the heart. (1 John ii. 14).

Nearly 600 young men, members of associations in the North-east Metropolitan District Union, assembled for a special gathering at Stratford Conference Hall, on November 15. Mr. T. F. Victor Buxton presided. After some hearty words from Rev. Canon Pelly, Rev. Archibald G. Brown gave a stimulating address on the Y.M.C.A. motto for the year: "Not by might, nor by power, but by my Spirit." He warned his hearers that anything which takes the place of the Spirit of God means failure. Mr. R. Burn, who followed, pointed out that the most important work that members of Y.M.C.A.'s have before them is to feed the uncared for: indifferent crowds of men who are beyond the reach of the churches. It is a matter of regret in the district that the health of the travelling secretary, Mr. F. L. Porter, should necessitate the relinquishment, for the present, of the duties he has so enthusiastically performed. Prolonged rest has been ordered.

A Roman Catholic Boy.

SOME little time ago I was reading a story which I thought perhaps you might like to hear. It was about a little boy who lived in the county of Galway, and who had been brought up a Roman Catholic. He had been attending a mission school which had been opened in the neighbourhood, and had there learnt to trust Jesus as his Saviour. Such was his love for Christ that he longed that his father and mother should trust Him too, and every evening he used to take out his little Bible and read to his parents.

At length the priest came to hear of his zeal, and he prepared himself to pronounce one of his most awful curses upon the lad the following Sunday. The day arrived, and so terrible were the words he uttered that the boy's father stepped forward and begged the priest to desist. Moreover, he promised him that his son should never enter the mission school again. Returning home, the father called his son, told him what had occurred, and forbade him ever to return to school.

"Father," said the lad, "I have learned the fifth commandment. I will obey."

Some time passed; the boy kept his word, but regularly morning and evening he used to go away.

One day his father followed him, saw him go to a tree, sit down and take out his Bible. The father rushed forward, saying—

"Why, this is as bad as going to school. Give me that book."

The poor boy's tears gushed forth, as he said: "Father, it's all I have left."

The father was touched, and they shed tears together; and before they left the tree the boy had permission to return to school, and read his Bible undisturbed!

This is but a simple story, yet there are two important lessons we can learn from it. The first is—Trust. The little lad could not have told his parents anything about Jesus and his love if he had not first of all trusted Him as his own Saviour, and been washed in the blood of Jesus, which cleanseth us from all sin. It is not until we see that we are sinners—for all of us have sinned—in God's sight, that we can come to Him and ask Him to forgive us. But perhaps you say: "How am I to be forgiven?" By believing that God so loved you that He sent his only Son to die in your place. Jesus Christ is the only one who can save us, "for there is none other name under heaven given among men whereby we must be saved."

Will you not give Him your heart to-day? He is longing and waiting to receive you, and says, "Him that cometh to Me, I will in no wise cast out."

The second lesson we can learn is—To tell others about Christ. When we give our hearts to Jesus Christ, and we know that we are his children, He wants us to go and tell someone else about his love. There are times when we cannot speak, and then we have to show by our actions that we belong to Jesus. By our kind works and gentle manners to all those around us, we can let our light shine brightly.

"What are you doing for Jesus?
Are you striving each day
By little acts of kindness,
To brighten someone's way?"

His Mother's Training.

ROLAND stopped and looked at the sign,

"BOY WANTED."

It hung outside a large cutlery establishment, next to a store where there had been a big fire. He had made up his mind that he was old enough to look for work and try to relieve mother. Should he go in?

He hesitated, then with all the courage he could command went inside. He was sent back to a room where men on high stools were writing in big books, too busy to notice him, but a tall gentleman did and questioned him so fast he could hardly answer.

"What kind of work do you expect to do? Don't know? Most boys do. Never worked out before? Suppose you think it's all play. "Well," pointing to some steps, "go down there, and the man at the foot will tell you what to do."

Roland went down and found half a dozen boys at work, with their sleeves rolled up, cleaning and polishing knives. The man at the foot of the steps looked up and said:

"Come to try your hand? Well, three have just left in disgust; doesn't seem to be boys' work, somehow, but it's got to be done. You see," he said, picking up some knives and scissors and showing spots of rust on them, "the water that saved our building the other night injured some of our finest goods. If you want to try your hand at cleaning, I'll show you how. We pay by the dozen."

"'Tisn't fair," said one of the boys; "some have more rust on than others."

"If you don't like our terms, you needn't work for us," said the foreman, and the boy, muttering that he wanted to be an errand boy and see something of life, left, while Roland went to work with a will. As he finished each piece he held it up, examined it critically, and wondered if mother would think it well done.

When the hour for closing came, the gentleman who had sent him downstairs appeared and, looking round at the boys, said:

"Well?"

"There is the boy we want," said the foreman, pointing to Roland. "He will take pride in doing anything you give him to do. He has been well trained."

Again the tall man spoke quickly.

"That's want we want. 'Boy wanted' doesn't mean any kind of boy. Mother know you came? No? Well, take her your first wages, and tell her there's a place open to you here. Then put your arms around her neck, and thank her for teaching you to be thorough. If more boys were thorough, more boys would succeed in life."

"I guess, mother," said Roland, when he told her about it, "it was because I tried to do everything as you would like it. I forgot I was doing it because there a was a 'boy wanted.'"—Sunday School Advocate.

Christian Endeavour Topic.

TOPIC FOR DECEMBER 2.

Spending Time and Pains for Christ. (Matt. xxv. 1-13).

WHAT a marvellous power the Master had to take up a simple incident, as that of these ten young girls waiting on the door step for the coming of the bridal procession, and making it of undying interest and significance. Ruskin says that the pure heart may see heaven reflected in a pool.

The foolish virgins are a great contrast or foil to show up the excellence of the wise. They made five great mistakes. (1) They made no provision for the continuance of their light. We all need to burn and glow. It is not enough merely to have the lamp; it must be lit, and when once lighted, we must see to it that the light is maintained, because there is something for the fire to feed on. We must not merely be negatively free from outward blame; we must be on fire, there must be a positive intensity of zeal. It is good to be always "zealously affected" in a good thing. How many there are who are on fire and in earnest during the first stage of their religious life. They are present at every meeting, and engage in every good work, but they do not continue. They have made no provision for maintaining the flame which they have had kindled by the grace of God. They have lamps, but have neglected to take oil. That oil stands for fellowship with the Lord Jesus, for the daily study of the Bible, for the kindling communion of saint with saint, for the grace of the Holy Spirit, who is compared to oil.

(2) They slept. There was a difference between their sleep and that of the wise. There are two kinds of sleep. The one arises from a sense of security and trust. All has been done that could be done. Every preparation has been made. Every precaution taken. We sleep because we know that restless and nervous sleeplessness will not enable us to meet the unknown future, but on the contrary, and so we resign ourselves deliberately to the care of God. So Peter slept before his execution; and the Duke of Argyle. So many a great commander, having made all his dispositions for the fight, has been able to abandon himself to tranquil and child-like slumber. But there is another kind of sleep. The sleep of the sentry, when the foe is stealing up the pass. The sleep of the pilot, when the ship is making for the serried teeth of the black rocks. The sleep of the nurse, when the patient's life is quivering in the balance. These foolish ones had no right to sleep, when they were all so utterly unready, to meet the Bridegroom. Theirs should have been the unresting search for those who could sell them oil. Let us arouse such lethargic souls from their fatal sleep, lest they sleep the sleep of death. They say peace, peace, when there is no peace. We must not take things for granted. We have no right to abandon ourselves to a happy-go-lucky spirit. We have no justification for taking things coolly, as though they must all come right at last. If we do, the bridegroom will come at a time that we looked not for Him, and our doom will be irrevocably sealed.

(3) They supposed that they could procure oil from the wise. "Give us of your oil." But the appeal was in vain. Every man has to give an account of himself to God. We cannot pass on our faith, or love, or preparedness. The child cannot buy of the mother; or the scholar of the teacher. However much a friend may yearn over the condition of his friend, he cannot save him from the consequences of his neglect and sin, by passing over to him aught of his own grace. Each must bear his own burden of responsibility in the sight of God. We must go and buy for ourselves. Thank God, we may buy without money and without price. But each must appropriate the living grace and power of Jesus for himself.

(4) They thought they could get in. "Lord, Lord, open to us." But the door was irrevocably closed. With such a text as this before them, how can men preach the doctrine of a second chance, of the ultimate salvation of everyone, and lead souls to think that somehow they will manage to escape the results of their own neglect? "How shall we escape, if we neglect so great salvation?" What did our Lord mean when He spoke of eternal punishment, of the shut door, of the weeping, wailing, and gnashing of teeth?

(5) They thought that the Bridegroom would recognise them. But He said, "I know you not." Let each ask himself, "Does Jesus know me? Will He recognise me at last? Have I the spot of his children?" We may be known by minister and teacher, and yet not known by Jesus, and not to be known by Him is to be yet in the gall of bitterness and the bond of iniquity. The only way to be sure is to kneel at his feet until He seals us with the Holy Spirit, and says, "I have known thee by thy name, and thou art mine."

C.E. NOTES.

New York has been the scene of a most helpful Convention. The Quiet Hour Services each morning were seasons of wonderful blessing. One of the most notable features of the Convention was the presence of one hundred and fifty ministers. A special meeting was convened for them presided over by Rev. C. M. Sheldon.

The fourth All India Convention has recently been held at Bangalore, and proved a most inspiring time, delegates coming from all parts of the country. Great enthusiasm was created by a cablegram, from Dr. Clark from America, announcing that an admirable secretary had been secured for the work of the All India Christian Endeavour Union. The subjects of the speeches in the Welcome Meeting were—"What Christian Endeavour means for the Indian Village," and "What it means for all India." Later on in the Convention the speakers chose such topics as "India's Call to Christian Endeavour," and "The Missionary Power of the Cross."

One afternoon a great demonstration took place in the city's spacious gardens, when a goodly number of Indians, Europeans, and Americans, united in song and speech. Variety in language, flag and costume, were charming. It was a great and historic Convention, the power of the Holy Spirit being manifest throughout. The President of the South India Union for the coming year is Principal J. P. Cotelingam, M.A.; the President of the All India Union, Rev. J. P. Jones, D.D., of Madura.

International S.S. Lesson.

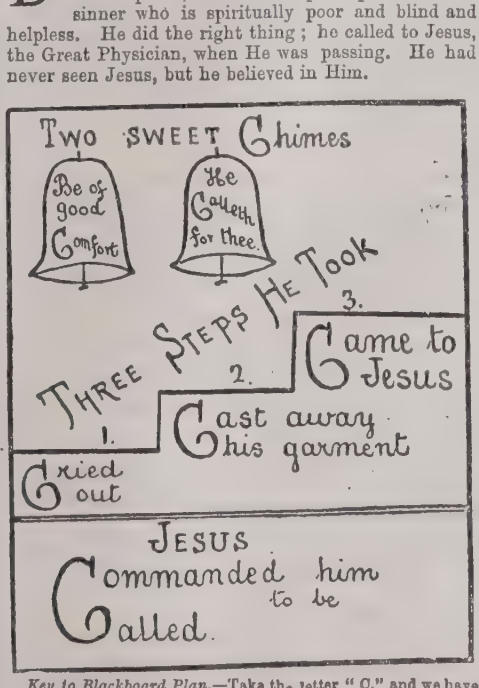
December 9, 1900.

Bartimæus Healed (Mark x. 46-52).

Golden Text.—"Lord, that I might receive my sight" (Mark x. 51).

Introduction.

BARTIMÆUS means "son of Timæus" (46); he was evidently well-known; poor, and blind and helpless; what a complete picture of the sinner who is spiritually poor and blind and helpless. He did the right thing; he called to Jesus, the Great Physician, when He was passing. He had never seen Jesus, but he believed in Him.



Two Sweet Chimes
Be of good Comfort
He Calleth for thee
Three Steps He Took
1. Cried out
2. Came to Jesus
3. Cast away his garment
Jesus Commanded him to be Called.

Key to Blackboard Plan.—Take the letter "C," and we have the whole outline of the story.

1.—What the People said.

(46) There were a great number of people.

(48) It was an unkind crowd; they tried to stop Bartimæus from speaking or coming to Jesus. Do we ever discourage anyone?

(49) But they had to call him after all. To the blind beggar the two sentences spoken to him were like the chimes of two sweet bells, full of music. "Be of good comfort," "He calleth thee."

John xi. 28. And He calls for you? Have you answered his loving "Come unto Me"?

2.—What Jesus Said.

(49) He heard the cry at once, and commanded (would have him called).

(51) "What wilt thou?"

(52) "Go thy way, thy faith hath saved thee" (margin).

Trace out many other instances where Christ uses the same expression: "Thy faith hath saved thee."

Look at a contrast to Bartimæus in Mark ix. 22. "If" and the answer v. 23 "If."

There was no "if" about Bartimæus, it was a cry full of faith—"Lord, that I might see."

3. What the Blind Man Did.

Cried: "Lord, have mercy" (48).

"Lord, sight is my need" (51).

Lord was the highest title he could give to Jesus. It was sometimes put as "Rabboni," and there were three or four degrees in which it was used. Rab, Rabbi, Rabban, Rabboni.

Cast: His loose garment which might have hindered him coming quickly was cast on one side (50), and he came in simple faith. How about our loose garments? Look in Heb. xii. 1 to see what they are; and Phil. iii. 7-9; and let us be willing to get rid of all that hinders a full consecration and a simple coming by faith to the mighty Saviour.

Came.—Three steps he took (see Blackboard Plan), and we too must mount the same three steps. Luke xviii. 43 adds a little more to Mark's three words—"He followed Jesus," he also glorified God, and his influence spread, for all the people gave praise to God as well (Acts xxxviii. 10).

The Gift of Sight followed by the Gratitude of Service.

Points and Outlines.

The Way of the Righteous.

SAFE (Prov. ii. 8); Holy (Isa. xxxv. 8); Plain (Prov. xv. 19); Loving (1 Cor. xii. 31); Perfect (Ps. ci. 2); Peaceful (Luke i. 79).

Three Importunates.

I. "Lord save me" (Matt. xiv. 30).
II. "Lord, help me" (Matt. xv. 25).
III. "Lord, remember me (Luke xxiii. 42).

C. J. G.

A Question of Proportion.

Wholesome fruits and deadly poisons have in them the same properties, but they differ in their proportions. If the proportions are right, the thing is good; if the proportions are wrong, the thing is evil.

Dr. John Pulsford.

The Two Builders.

(Matt. vii. 24-27.)

In this parable we are instructed regarding the right use of the Divine Word. I. What is necessarily required in order to this use? (a) Hearing the Word—"Whosoever heareth these sayings of mine" (24). (b) Doing it—"And doeth them" (24; the opposite, 26). II. The great blessing it secures is a well-grounded salvation. (a) It secures salvation. Who built his house? (24). (b) And this salvation is well grounded (25; the opposite, 27).

Faith and Unbelief.

Faith maketh a man the servant of God; incredulity (unbelief) maketh him the servant of the devil.
Faith showeth us God to be a sweet Father; incredulity showeth Him a terrible judge.
Faith holdeth stiff by the Word of God; incredulity wavereth here and there.
Faith counteth and holdeth God to be true; incredulity holdeth Him false and a liar.

Patrick Hamilton.
(Scottish Martyr, Sixteenth Century.)

Discord Rebuked.

We have no wish to induce you to adopt our ceremonial; but uniformity among yourselves is very important. Is there any religion in a gold or wooden cup, or in the mystic bread being administered from silver or a glass dish? Has Christ any more regard for those who sit, than for those who stand or kneel? Does he obtain less who receives the sacrament from his own hand than he who takes it from the hand of another person? O wretched beings that we are, that in calamitous times like these, when the light of the Gospel hath so clearly shone upon us, we should be so in bondage to elements (Gal. iv. 9) and forget how our liberty is to be used to the edification of our neighbour!

Œcolampadius.

Rev. G. Campbell Morgan.

MR. W. R. MOODY and Rev. G. Campbell Morgan attended the service in the City Temple last Thursday morning, and after the sermon Dr. Parker said: "We have with us to-day Mr. Moody, the son of the renowned evangelist. He would be more welcome but for an awful fact with which I thus publicly charge him. He is taking away from us one of our best evangelists, Rev. G. Campbell Morgan. It is too bad; it seems to me that America would take away from us all our best preachers, teachers, and evangelists, if it could. And yet America in doing so is quite right, though I begrudge this last Christian burglary.

"England ought not to have let Mr. Campbell Morgan go. Poor old sleepy England, to let anybody go. It is very sad, but such is the fact. Give me Campbell Morgan, John McNeill, W. R. Lane, and several captains and colonels of the Salvation Army, and we should do a great work if all the churches were united and enthusiastic in the matter. I do not want such brethren to go, the whole place will to me be colder and poorer without them; they are so gracious, so devoted, so full of the best faculty for Christian work. Can we stand by and let some of our best and strongest men go to other fields? Yet I say to my dear friend Campbell Morgan, as he sits in front of me to-day, Go with our blessing, go with our confidence, and may God's great benediction rest upon you, and give you to see that this providence, so harsh to us, is really God's providence; and when you have had a long blessed day yonder, may there be light for you 'at evening time!'" (the text of the morning).

Mr. Sankey's Meetings.

THE visit of Mr. Ira D. Sankey to Bath on November 20 excited keen interest, and Argyle Chapel was crowded in every part both afternoon and evening. The veteran singer was listened to with rapt attention, and his rendering of favourite solos, particularly the "Ninety and Nine," delighted the people.

Proceeding to Bristol, Mr. Sankey experienced an enthusiastic welcome. At the afternoon gathering in the Y.M.C.A. Hall, Mr. J. Storrs Fry presided. He said that it was a great pleasure to hear Mr. Sankey's voice once more. "We love him for his Christian character, and for the hymns he has given us. We love our old English hymns, but have room in our hearts for the newer ones. Mr. Sankey and Mr. Moody worked together magnificently, each filling the place assigned him by God. They toiled together as fellow labourers, with the Lord as their Master." Mr. Moody, it would be remembered, helped in starting that Y.M.C.A.

Mr. Sankey expressed his pleasure at meeting old friends again, remarking that he was glad also to see younger generations springing up following in the footsteps of the older ones. Having alluded to the death of Mr. Moody, he said it had been his, the speaker's, thought some day to have a time of rest after the forty years of work in which he had been engaged, and to go away across the sea into the Eastern World, and stand on the "green hill" of which he had so often sung. This expectation was at length realized. Proceeding, Mr. Sankey spoke on "Singing through Palestine," and intermingled his address with some solos.

Colonel Saville presided over the evening meeting, when there was again a crowded attendance. He heartily welcomed Mr. Sankey, and alluded to a meeting he had presided over many years ago, when Mr. Sankey spoke at the Colston Hall. Mr. Sankey was heartily received upon rising to give his Service of Sacred Song and Story. In the course of his address he made a fervent appeal to young people to train and use their voices in Gospel work. The occasion was one of spiritual profit and the words and solos of the esteemed singer will long live in the memories of those who were privileged to be present.

On Saturday last Mr. Sankey visited Weston-super-Mare, under the auspices of the Y.M.C.A. A correspondent writes: Mr. Sankey was greeted by crowded and deeply interested audiences in the Victoria Hall. In the afternoon, he gave "Singing through Palestine," and in the evening "Memories of D. L. Moody," blended with sacred songs and solos, old and new. Many hearts were moved by Mr. Sankey's references to his beloved fellow-labourer. Mr. Sankey thanked his singing helpers for their contributions from musical leaflets, which were much appreciated by the audiences. Our American visitor also responded to an urgent call to sing and speak to a company of men on Sunday afternoon in the gymnasium of the Y.M.C.A. The place was crowded, and Mr. Sankey gave a Gospel address. Hundreds are grateful for these meetings, which were like refreshing "streams by the way." On Sunday, November 18, Mr. Sankey sang at the evening service in Portman Chapel. Although there was little opportunity for announcement, the building was crowded. The solos were deeply impressive.

On the evening of Sunday, December 2, Mr. Sankey is to speak and sing in Dr. Hanson's Church, Marylebone, W. Other meetings arranged are: Bournemouth, December 7; and Southampton, December 10.

Obituary.

MR. GEORGE H. LEE.

THE work of the Y.M.C.A. has sustained a serious loss by the death of Mr. George H. Lee, of Wimbledon, which occurred on Nov. 19. For twenty years Mr. Lee rendered devoted service as honorary secretary of the South-west Suburban District Union. He was closely identified also with the work of the National Council from its commencement in 1882; and he was also associated with the Band of Hope movement. Mr. Lee retired not long since from the position of accountant to the Charity Commission in Whitehall.

REV. SAMUEL J. STONE.

A facile writer of sacred verse, Rev. Samuel J. Stone, rector of All Hallows, London Wall, who passed away on November 19, is perhaps most widely known as the author of the popular hymn, "The Church's one foundation." Mr. Stone was much interested in the welfare of factory girls, a large number of whom, employed in the City factories, come up to Liverpool-street Station by the early workmen's trains from motives of economy. In order that they should not have to pace the streets till their workrooms should be opened, Mr. Stone placed his church at their service in the early morning hours.

REV. PREBENDARY WHITTINGTON.

By the death of Prebendary Whittington, the City of London loses one of its best-known religious and educational workers. He was long associated with the Merchant Taylor's School. In 1861 he became Principal of the City of London College, and in the following year the Corporation of the City elected him to the Rectory of St. Peter-upon-Cornhill, of which he had been Evening Lecturer. In 1881 he received from his Bishop a Prebendal Stall in St. Paul's Cathedral. As a citizen and a city incumbent, as a diocesan worker, as a friend and self-denying helper of many charities, Prebendary Whittington seemed to be everywhere. Yet his parish had his first care. The services at St. Peter's were reverently carried out, and the church was a centre of usefulness.

MR. WILLIAM E. SKINNER.

The church and congregation of Zion Chapel, Bedminster, Bristol, have sustained a severe loss in the removal by death of their beloved Sunday school superintendent and deacon at the comparatively early age of fifty-three. Mr. Skinner was born at Topsham in Devon, and while quite young gave his heart to the Saviour, and devoted himself to Christian work. At twenty-one he was superintendent of the Sunday school in his native place, and has ever since been identified with work for the Master. He was spiritually-minded, and brought his religion into all he did, whether as a business man, poor law guardian, or temperance worker.

Mr. Skinner was for some years leader of the Men's Bible Class at Zion Chapel, which he reluctantly resigned on being elected Sunday school superintendent; but threw his whole soul into his new work with very beneficial results to the school. He had been in failing health for some time, though it was hoped he might become stronger. He "died in harness," having been in the school the previous Sunday. Great sympathy is felt for the widow, who has recently become blind, and for the four young people on whom may their father's mantle fall. E. F. E.

REV. ALFRED PEACHE.

The death is announced of Rev. Alfred Peache, one of the staunchest supporters of the Evangelical party in the Church of England. The great work of his life lay in the expenditure of his ample means to promote the principles which he held. In the year 1863 he founded and built, at great expense to himself and his family, St. John's Hall, Highbury, for the training of candidates for ordination on Evangelical lines. This, at least, was his intention, and, if a few of the Highbury men did afterwards leave the lines laid down for them by their founder and their teachers, the great majority have turned out such as his intentions would have them. The expenses of the college course were kept by his direction within very moderate bounds, and the college for nearly forty years has served as a useful avenue to the ministry for those who are debarred by circumstances from obtaining a university training. Partly with a view of securing benefices for the men trained at Highbury, and partly to make sure that the patronage should in any case be given to men of Evangelical views, Mr. Peache became a considerable purchaser of advowsons. He placed them in trust with a body called "the Peache trustees." He took the greatest personal interest in the careers of the Highbury students, and would pay them visits of fatherly encouragement in their parishes.

BISHOP DICKSON, FREE CHURCH OF ENGLAND.

I have been shocked to hear of the sudden home-call of Bishop Dickson, head of the Free Church of England, on Wednesday night (14th inst.), at Crowborough. A few hours previously he was speaking at a meeting of church workers. The Free Church of England was organized in 1844 as a counteracting movement to Oxford Tractarianism. I preached the first sermon at the opening of his first church, and his consecration took place in my church, Lambeth, eleven years ago. Though rejoicing in his blessedness, I feel shocked at the sudden separation from one whose friendship I had very recently formed, with whom I had been engaged in Gospel work the preceding Sunday, and whose parting benediction I had received only two days before—"God be with us if we do not meet again." I had learned much from him concerning the church to which he belonged.

In its public worship is used a revised edition of the Prayer Book, from which all passages with a Romish tendency are expunged. It is free to associate the laity with the clergy in the government and work of the Church, and to hold communion with all who call on the name of the Lord Jesus as their common Saviour.

It strictly holds to all that is plainly Protestant and Evangelical in the Established Church, and endeavours to meet the requirements of Churchmen aggrieved by Ritualistic assumption and innovations. It accepts the Holy Scriptures as the Word of God, and the sole rule of faith and practice. It recognises Episcopacy as a "desirable form of Church polity, but repudiates the Romish dogma of apostolical succession." Its clergy number twenty-seven, its evangelists ten, its bishops two.

In earlier life the Bishop had studied at Guy's Hospital, and had laboured much in rendering medical help to the poor. He spoke with much interest of various methods of ministry among the poor of his parish, and of his brotherhood with all Christians who were willing to share it.

THE NEW CENTURY.

General Communion of Christians.

The opening of a new year has, for the past fifty years, been made the occasion for united Prayer Meetings; and these Assemblies have shown how possible it is for the "one body," animated by the "one Spirit," called in "one hope," having "one Lord," "one God and Father," to unite freely and happily together on the simple ground of a common Christianity. Now that a new century, as well as a new year, is dawning, would it commend itself to Christians generally to make the fresh period of time the occasion for meeting on the same principle to take the Lord's Supper together some week day in January?

Evangelistic.

The Weaver Brothers at Abergavenny.

A MISSION under the auspices of the Y.M.C.A., in which the Evangelical Churches cordially united, was concluded on Friday night, the Weaver Brothers leaving for Hartlepool on Saturday. The Gospel was powerfully preached. It travelled by the way of Sinai. The words had teeth. Consciences were severely, terribly stricken. Many were offended and left in that spirit, who doubtless will fall in due time like wounded birds, to rise again new creatures in Christ Jesus. I had the happiness of being present at the praise meeting, when a large number of young and older ones confessed Christ, besides many others who were not at that meeting. There never has been so large a meeting of men in the town, nor so deep an impression made on them. God's Spirit is evidently working mightily in many places throughout the land.

R. C. M.

The Evangelization Society.

This excellent Society has rendered the district of Tiptree Heath, Essex, valuable service in sending faithful and earnest men to conduct missions. We have had Mr. Charles Noakes and Mr. Collins, and now Mr. Fisher has concluded a fortnight's services.

Night after night from 100 to 200 people have left their work on the land and elsewhere to hear the Gospel, set forth in plain and loving terms by the Evangelist. Indeed they seemed reluctant to leave the building, Mr. Fisher conducted three services on the Sunday, at the last two the attendance was about 200. Several decided for Christ during the mission. Has the Gospel failed in its power to attract men? Nay. John xii. 32 is as true as ever.

A. C. Wilkin.

Gipsy Smith at Plymouth.

A united mission in Plymouth Guildhall, promoted by the Three Towns Free Church Council, was recently concluded. It was a definite and earnest effort to reach the outside and unchurched element of the population. Hundreds of persons entered the inquiry rooms. Gipsy Smith was the missioner, and his earnest efforts and impressive appeals met with an eager response. On the first evening the crowd was so large as seriously to embarrass the workers, as every inch of space was blocked and penitents were quite unable to make their way to the inquiry rooms. On some of the subsequent evenings this was obviated by an attempt to limit the audience to more manageable dimensions. On the second Sunday, however, the crowd managed to break through all barriers, and the audience was immense, whilst it was computed that more than 2,000 persons were unable to gain admission at the evening meeting. This proved to be the crowning service of the series, and scores of persons forced their way through the dense masses of people to the inquiry rooms.

Tent Work in Philadelphia.

At the closing rally of the summer work, undertaken by the Presbyterian Evangelistic Committee of Philadelphia, addresses were given by Revs. Charles Cuthbert Hall, D.D., and George T. Purves, D.D., of New York City, who spoke in enthusiastic terms in regard to this feature of denominational work. Dr. Purves dwelt upon the importance of the Church adapting her methods to present conditions. Dr. Hall spoke fervently upon the importance of such aggresive work in relation to the Church itself.

The reflex influence of this work cannot be overestimated. The letters that are received from various cities and many friends indicate a yearning desire on the part of many Christian workers for aggressive evangelistic campaigns.

Mr. John H. Converse recently wrote of the work as follows:—"The conditions in Philadelphia have been exceptionally favourable, and wherever like conditions prevail there is no doubt that a similar work would be in like manner effective and profitable. The tent services have attracted multitudes of non-churchgoers, and have resulted in giving the Gospel to thousands who would not otherwise have been reached. The services may be regarded as a most practical work of church extension. At a time when many of the churches are necessarily closed during the extreme heat of summer, thousands who would not enter an ordinary church will gather in and about the tents. The singing of our familiar hymns and the preaching of the plain Gospel have proved sufficient attractions without sensational appendages. In round figures over 150,000 have been brought within the reach of the message of grace each summer, and about 900 persons each year have given evidence of their interest and of their purpose to lead a Christian life. The experiences of the past two seasons have certainly demonstrated that summer evangelistic work should be a permanent institution in Philadelphia. An especial cause of rejoicing may be found in the fact that this work has, so far as I am aware, enjoyed the unanimous support and the most cordial co-operation of all Presbyterian pastors of our city."

Mr. E. P. Telford has held a twelve days' mission at Wood Green Baptist Church (Rev. W. Winston Haines). There were many seekers.

Blessing was giving at a recent mission in St. Miles' Church, Norwich, conducted by Rev. C. Fenwick Ward. Many were helped and impressed by the Bible readings and Gospel addresses.

Miss Ingram, of Troedyrhiw, Glamorganshire, has conducted a fortnight's mission at Stansbatch Baptist Church. Miss Ingram's stay was productive of much good among the members, while several who professed conversion were added to the church.

An encouraging mission has been held at Bennerley Rooms, Clapham Junction, resulting in some cases of definite conversion to God. One man who spent the Saturday night before the mission in a public-house is now a Christian. Another case was that of three big lads, the terror of the Sunday class, for whom special prayer was made, and who are now finding their delights in prayer and praise. S. Levermore.

Under the auspices of the Northampton Y.M.C.A., services have been held which have resulted in blessing to many. The meetings were conducted by Mr. Robert Atkins, of Brighton, Revs. Herbert J. Wood, of Liverpool, and W. E. Horley, a missionary from Malaysia. The gatherings were characterized by a gracious outpouring of the Holy Spirit. Before the mission closed, the Assembly Hall was taxed to its utmost to accommodate the people. As a result it has been decided to hold an evangelistic service every Sunday evening.

Under the auspices of the Arlington Road Temperance Society, Mr. Bob Johnson, the converted "Negro" minstrel, has just completed a six days' Gospel Temperance Mission in Park Chapel Schools, Arlington Road, N.W. The meetings were largely attended, and the story of Mr. Johnson's life and conversion made a marked impression. His deeply spiritual words to workers were very helpful, and great good must come of his visit. H. T. R.

Mr. Edward Hurditch conducted a mission at Presteign Baptist Church, October 28 - November 11. The first week was mainly devoted to the deepening of spiritual life in Christians, and his efforts were crowned in this direction by blessing. The remainder of the mission was devoted to the unconverted. Many stirring appeals and solemn warnings were given, the atonement was proclaimed, and the great love of God for the sinner so set forth as to win many to the Saviour.

D. Howell Jenkins, Pastor.

What the Washington, D.C., Daily Record describes as "The Big Revival," conducted by Mr. James Wharton, of Barrow-in-Furness, continues to spread with great rapidity amongst all classes. Old and young alike in great numbers have been brought to Christ, and the People's Congregational Church where the meetings have been held is now enjoying a great spiritual uplift, such as they have not had for many years. Mr. Wharton is the evangelist with whom Mr. and Mrs. R. C. Morgan were fellow labourers in their visit to the Southern States two years ago.

At Limerick Y.M.C.A. an evangelistic mission, conducted by Dr. Harry Guinness, commenced on Sunday, November 18. The Gospel was preached in the power of the Spirit, and there were many seekers. The Munster Hall was filled each night. The medical lecture for men was a remarkable occasion, men of all classes and creeds listening with rapt attention as Dr. Guinness went on to plead with them to forsake their sins and accept Christ. Several decided before the meeting closed. Miss L. Froste, of Dublin, sung Gospel solos very sweetly at all the meetings.

Miss Glover, of Edinburgh, has held a fifteen days' evangelistic mission at Dunfermline. James Street Hall, where the week-night meetings were held, was well filled during the first week, and was crowded out nightly during the second, while the Sunday night meetings were held in St. Margaret's Hall, seated for 1,600. On the last two Sundays this hall was crowded, and many were unable to obtain admission. There was a deep interest throughout, and many were blessed. Speaking simply, and without using any artifice to attract the people, Miss Glover reached the hearts of many with the "old, old, story," and again that story has proved sufficient to draw the sinful and erring to the feet of Jesus. To Him be all the glory.

Notes & Comments

THIS week we give a special survey of Home Missions (more particularly those at work in London). We read in Jonah iv. 5 :

Jonah went out of the city, and there made him a booth, and sat under it in the shadow, till he might see what would become of the city.

There are many devout persons whose circumstances necessitate their living "out of the city," and who, in the shadow and comfort of their home, wonder, like Jonah, "what will become of the city." Let such read the reports we give this week. If it were not for such restraining and rescuing agencies as these labouring in our midst, no human voice could say "what would become of the city"!

We hope our readers will respond very generously to this call; and we remind them that contributions for any of the Institutions, Societies, or Missions mentioned at any time in our columns, or for any other accredited organizations, are received by us, and remitted without deduction of any kind.

Perhaps there is no feature of the present day more marked than the waning of enthusiasm. Politically, socially, religiously, we are in the trough of the wave, so far as any real zeal for progress is concerned. The speeches delivered by our political leaders are marked by the absence of any high appeal, any ringing call, to great emotions and ideals. Our social evils cry aloud for settlement, or at least for a strenuous attempt at their amelioration, but the voice of the reformer is like one crying in the desert. And there does not seem to be any general evangelic fervour in most of our churches. The old century is apparently about to pass away during a general and widespread fit of social and religious lethargy. What the Germans call a Welt-Schmerz, a world-weariness, seems to have fallen on humanity generally.

This state of things makes both a difficulty and an opportunity for the Churches of Christ, in view of the National Mission to be held in January and February next. Religion is the only real and abiding fountain of enthusiasm. There is no zeal like the zeal born in the House of God. And there is a sense in which the very weariness of soul that has so widely fallen on the world, may be the precursor to a splendid awakening at the dawn of the new century. If the opportunity is seized adequately, it is impossible to say what may not come of this effort to evangelize the nation, and give a new start to the saving ministries of religion among those who have not as yet acknowledged their need of a Saviour. All betterment, social, religious, political, begins with the individual; and if we can get the individuals in the community to awake to a sense of the holy responsibilities of life, it will not end there, but presently revivify the national life in all its vast ramifications.

The Round Table Conference on the doctrine of the "Holy Communion and its Expression in Ritual," which was held at Fulham Palace at the invitation of the Bishop of London, does not seem likely to result in increasing harmony among the two schools that clearly exist in the Church of England. As The Times remarks differences between Evangelical Churchmen and the Ritualists are so deep and wide that there is no hope of the gulf being bridged over. The former party, represented by Mr. Dimock, Dr. Moule, and Dr. Wace, "offer an unqualified denial" to the doctrine of the Real Presence championed by Canon Gore, Lord Halifax, and Canon Newbolt.

The Conference has, however, doubtless done an essential service by clearing the air, and revealing the real issues. Mr. Dimock, speaking of the historical position of the Church of England, said that she "took her stand on one side of the doctrinal gulf, on the other side of which stood the teaching of the Real Presence." Now a large and dominant section in the Church has crossed over, and reaffirmed that teaching in a subtle but unmistakable way. The future duty of the Evangelical section is growing clearer. It is to take its stand boldly for the Protestant character of the Church with more uncompromising fidelity.

At the invitation of the Bishop of Ripon, a paper was read before the Diocesan Conference at Bradford last week upon the influence of the daily Press. The journalist who undertook to read the paper made a vigorous defence of the modern newspaper, and, replying to criticism, said :—

It was sometimes said that too little space was devoted to the daily religious life of the country, and too much to its recreations and amusements. But that was not the fault of the Press. The contents of all newspapers were determined by a trained perception of what the public would read. . . . It was simply a question of trading on plain business principles, and of avoiding the fatal error of combining philanthropy with business.

Then what becomes of the claim which is so loftily made that "the Press is the great educator"? When the Press resolves itself into a camera for photographing everything that goes on it, degenerates from being a leader into a thing led, and so its virility departs. When Charles Kingsley was reprimanded by a friend for preaching things that "the people would not like," he replied "My Master did not send me to preach what people like, but to tell them what they ought to know." And the Press, which professes to have a mission to educate, should certainly adopt a similar motto.

Again; if the Press sets out to cater for all, why is it that the utterances of some of the most influential religious men of the time have comparatively so little space given to them in the daily papers? Do not Christian people form a large and influential section of the community? Why then, on business principles, are they not better served? On the other hand, why is such an excessive amount of space given to gamblers and low sportsmen? Are these people the influential, the patriotic, the desirable members of the State? Why then should they be so unduly patronized? The truth is that the ideal of the Press has been seriously lowered during recent years, and many journalists no longer even pretend to "educate" the public—it does not pay. We do not expect that secular newspapers should teach religion—that is not their function—but we have a right to demand that such a mighty engine as the daily Press should not become the auxiliary of men who care neither for their fellows nor for their country. This is to place power in the worst hands.

In an article on "Drinking Among Women," in the Sunday School Chronicle, Miss Agnes E. Slack (Hon. Sec. of the W.W.C.T.U.) attributes the unquestionable increase of drinking among women, mainly to the influence of the school of doctors who some forty years ago began to advocate the use of stimulants medicinally; followed by the passing of the Grocers' Licences Act in the early sixties. On the former point she quotes the evidence of Sir W. Gull before the Lord's Committee on Intemperance.

Forty years ago wine was moderately used, and so was brandy; then there came a change, owing chiefly, I think, to the School of King's College, headed by Dr. Todd. His theory was that diseases were chiefly due to debility, and required alcohol almost universally. Formerly diseases were divided into two classes, viz., phlogistic and anti-phlogistic. Dr. Todd's theory was that all diseases were weak or anti-phlogistic, and his treatment, therefore, was always with brandy, or, at least, I should say, almost universally in cases of acute disease. Since that time there has again been a great change.

Fortunately, the medical profession has greatly altered its attitude on this question, and it may be said that Dr. Todd's theory is now dead and buried. But the mischief had been largely done, and this generation is suffering greatly from the influence of this discredited school of medicine. Public opinion must be carefully educated to realize that no one in health is better for alcohol, and that only specific forms of disease are benefited by it. Until that is done, the practice of "tippling," so prevalent among women nowadays, will be persisted in under a mistaken notion. "If we forbear to deliver those who are drawn unto death, and those that are ready to be slain; if we say, Behold, I knew it not—doth not He that knoweth the heart consider it?"

The Belgian administration has issued an order prohibiting the sale or consumption of intoxicating drinks in the vicinity of the Chambers during the sittings of Parliament, and henceforth only tea and coffee and other non-intoxicants will be obtainable by the legislators during the sessions. A contemporary has expressed an opinion that a similar arrangement at Westminster would not be disastrous to either the intelligence or the business capacity of the new British Parliament, a view we are by no means inclined to dispute.

The French Minister of Education has despatched a circular to schoolmasters throughout the country, commanding them to make a special point of teaching the hygiene of temperance to their pupils. The children will be required to pass an examination in the subject. This step has been taken in consequence of the increasing drunkenness in France. Absinthe and other vile liquors can be obtained cheaply; consequently an alarming quantity of these poisons is consumed each year. In certain parts of France may be seen litre bottles of these destroying drinks sold at ninepence each. The Government, therefore, is acting wisely in sending out this circular. This is a hint also for ourselves. If education is an equipment for the work of life, surely it ought to include scientific information concerning one of the greatest foes we have to combat.

A fortnight ago was held the official day for humiliation and prayer throughout the Prussian monarchy. Services in the churches were crowded. The more thoughtful newspapers gave a survey of the national life and morals, which indicate that there is great need for such an observance. They pointed out the dangers which Germany, as a whole, has incurred through its rapid rise as a great industrial State, and the consequent increase of wealth among the people. Vice and crime, not only in the great cities, but in the country districts are increasing with a steadiness and persistence which must occasion serious reflection. Pride, ostentation, and luxury have attacked the upper circles like a canker, while increasing rudeness and vice are noticeably prevalent among the lower. It is the bounden duty of the preachers and leaders of the German nation to call on it to return to the plain and simple fashions of their fathers. But we cannot shut our eyes to the fact that, in view of the many forms of vice, notably impurity, gambling, and drinking, a day of humiliation would very appropriately close the century in this country also, and give an opportunity to the nation to consider its ways, and turn away from the evil in its midst.

A Christian contemporary has a stringent and timely leader upon what it calls "The Passion for Heterodoxy;" in the course of which the writer says:

> Such estimable and amiable heretics are not by any means so numerous as some novelists would have us suppose, nor are there as many men and women of great ability among the heterodox as is too cheaply assumed. Many showy and shallow young men, who would never make any sensation on ordinary lines, adopt heterodoxy as a rather promising means of gaining the reputation of being somewhat superior persons.

These words needed saying, and it would be well if they could be brought under the notice of a number of persons who are exactly described by this language. There is a disposition amongst the English people to take a man at his own valuation, and some heady pulpit mountebanks, knowing this, have traded upon it to their advantage. It is a terrible thing, however, when a man, in order to secure popularity, sows the seeds of doubt and negation in the hearts of his hearers.

Science has many beneficent aspects, but few of its contributions to human well-being and happiness could equal the power of foreseeing periods of drought and rainfall on certain portions of the earth's surface. This, however, is the claim made by Sir Norman Lockyer as regards the significance of sunspots. He has been comparing periods when sunspots have been abnormally numerous or abnormally absent, with periods of heavy drought or rainfall in India, and he believes he has found a certain law of relation between the two sets of phenomena, both apparently preceding an enhanced rainfall a year or two later. If this discovery proves to be a genuine one, it will be possible to forestall a famine, and to make the "full years" provide for the "lean years," as was done by Joseph long ago in Egypt. The periodical terrible sufferings of the Indian populations will in that case become a dark memory of the past, and the incalculable boon of prevention would make the present costly relief of the distressed and dying a needless thing.

Mr. King, the chief assistant in the Assyrian Department of the British Museum, has translated and edited some recently published documents of the reign of Hammurabi, king of Babylon about the year B.C. 2200, and the volume is regarded by those who are best qualified to judge as one of the most crushing blows ever given to the destructive school of Bible criticism. The iconoclasts have always sneeringly urged that the allusion to the passage of letters between Solomon and Hiram in regard to the erection of the Temple proved the late origin of the Book of Chronicles; yet Mr. King has found in these tablets of clay and their accompanying envelopes, a series of letters despatched from Babylon 4,000 years ago, in charge of a "Royal Postman." Thus it is manifest that the mail service of the time of Hezekiah (2 Chron. xxx. 6) was a reality, and not, as the Higher Criticism has asserted, a dream of a later scribe. Full of details of the daily life of the king and his subjects, the volume throws valuable light upon many a difficult passage in the Chronicles, and will, therefore, be invaluable to the student of God's Word.

The newly-issued quarterly statement of the Palestine Exploration Fund records an interesting discovery at Jerusalem, which illustrates forcibly the accuracy of Eastern tradition. According to one of these traditions the Well of Job has from time immemorial been identified with the Fullers' Fountain (Joshua xx. 7), and close by that well thirty or forty stone vats have been found, which are quite a different shape to those usually traced, and which were used in connection with presses for wine and oil. Some of these newly-found vats exactly resemble the fullers' vats depicted in various tomb paintings. The fullers' industry was as old as the time of Joshua, and this discovery is, therefore, valuable, as throwing a side-light upon several Biblical references.

It will be somewhat surprising to those who have not hitherto been aware of the fact that Professor Huxley, whose life work, so far as the Bible was concerned, was of an antagonistic and destructive character, strongly supported Mr. W. H. Smith's motion in favour of Bible education in elementary schools. Lord Avebury has recently stated that Huxley said he was unable to find any other way in which the religious feeling, which, he admitted, was "the essential basis of conduct," could be inculcated and maintained. And it is the same with many others who approach the Word of God in an ultra-critical and sceptical spirit, but who have nothing to suggest as a substitute for it, even merely as a basis of morals.

Unfortunately it can hardly be hoped that the new Parliament will be in a position to devote much attention to social questions, and it is to be feared that the pressing one of the housing of the poor will again be shelved indefinitely. Yet evidence continues to accumulate in regard to the terrible condition of things not only in our large centres, but also in the country districts. Miss Cochrane, the chairman of a Parish Council at St. Neots, has recently stated that she found in a village with only 430 inhabitants, thirty cottages with only one bedroom each, and in some cases in that one room ten persons slept. Many of the houses were utterly unfit for occupation. "Complaint is not made," Miss Cochrane says, "because the people fear increased rent or eviction." It is perhaps even more painful to read that "in Cambridgeshire the cottages on some of the college estates are bad indeed." Why should not the experiment of a Fair Rent Tribunal, such as has been in force in Ireland for some years back in connection with the Land Court, be established in order that such criminally neglectful property owners might be dealt with?

The insidious way in which the extreme High Church party endeavour to familiarize the children with Romish doctrine is illustrated very forcibly by the various manuals for young persons which, full of erroneous teaching in regard to the Lord's Supper, are being placed in the hands of the little attendants at the "object lesson" which is now openly called "Mass." At a recent Diocesan Conference at Truro, a motion was brought forward urging the desirability of arranging the Sunday services "so as to give a more prominent place to the celebration of the Holy Eucharist," and a supporter explained this to mean the training of people, "especially children, to look upon the offering of the Eucharist as the greatest service of the day."

> It was especially important to get the children to that service. They would not be able to do much with the adults, but they had to train the children. . . . They had to avoid the false antithesis that was going about with reference to the terms Mass or Communion —that if they had Communion it was not Mass, and if they had Mass they ought not to have communicants.

The political influence of the Pope—or rather the lack of it—is seen in the fact that, though this is Holy Year, no crowned Sovereign and no Prince of the blood has taken advantage of the seat prepared for Catholic Royalty beside the Pope on the Pontifical throne, nor have the Catholic Sovereigns of Europe made up for their absence by the munificence of their gifts to the Vatican treasury. While the Pope is clamouring for the renewal of his temporal powers and privileges, it is growing clear that as an international political force he is entirely spent. The outward trappings have gone because the reality was gone. It is not likely that either his secular power or his place in the councils of the nations will ever come back. Both are, we trust, passed beyond recall.

The failure of the Roman Catholic Church in France is becoming patent, even to her own leading ecclesiastics. The Abbé Pastorel, in a sermon to the Catholic Congress at Bourges, confesses that in that country—

> Men are drawing away from Christianity. Among the masses it is indifference; . . . in the middle and upper classes the men, with some miserable exceptions, are escaping us. In the intellectual circles we find no nearer approach to religion than a vague idealism. One is tempted to repeat, with some slight modification, the famous saying, "France no longer counts among Catholic nations."

Monsignor Ireland, the well-known American ecclesiastic, also made a strong indictment in the same direction. Considering that the Protestant Huguenots were practically exterminated in France two centuries ago, in order to provide a clear field for the Roman Catholic form of religion, this confession of failure is a lamentable reflection not only on the French people for their irreligiousness, but on the Romanism that has failed, with every political and social advantage on its side, to convert it. As a matter of fact, the Romish Church has only a semblance of life anywhere just now.

The Spirit and the Bride.

By Rev. F. B. MEYER, B.A.

In Rev. vi. we may read how the living creatures appeal for the Son of God to "Come," and put an end to war, pestilence, plague, famine, and death; and proceeding to chap. xxii. 17, I would emphasize the close identification that exists between the Holy Spirit and the Church," "The Spirit and the Bride say, Come. And he that heareth, let him say, Come. And he that is athirst, let him come: he that will, let him take the water of life freely." In the condition of a bride waiting for the consummation of marriage, the Church is represented as longing for her Lord to hasten his coming. We must distinguish between the Church and the churches, in this wonderful Apocalypse. In chaps. ii. iii. churches are dealt with; while, at the close of the Book, we have to do only with that one Holy Catholic Church which is made up of all those who believe in and hold the Head, Christ Jesus.

The attitude of the Spirit of God to the Church, is fully opened up in this Book. Grace and peace come from this source—the Holy Ghost in his sevenfold perfection, to the churches (i. 4). That the Spirit is perpetually instructing and guiding the individual churches of saints throughout this age, is evident from chaps. ii and iii. Happy is it when we preach the Gospel of Christ, and, in the heart of our congregation, there is the spontaneous upraising of the emphatic as in xiv. 13. On the extreme verge of the gulf that confronts us at the completion of this Book, the Spirit and the Bride are here on earth together, with one voice appealing to the Son of God to make haste and come. Any assembly of believers that is really filled with the power of the Holy Ghost, will always be a church which is expecting and waiting for the second advent.

"AMEN" OF THE HOLY SPIRIT,

While we recognize the omnipresence of the Holy Spirit, Scripture leads us to regard Him as being now specially and essentially located in the heart of the Church, the bride of Christ. This is exactly what our Lord taught us to expect (John xiv. 16, 26). The one Paraclete, Christ, was to become our Advocate before the throne; the other Advocate, the Holy Ghost, was to abide in the heart of the Church. That is why true prayer is the return tide of God's thought. The Lord's intention and its fulfilment are seen in a comparison of John xiv. 16 with Acts ii. 33. The mystery and the wonder of the ascension is that Jesus Christ, who came here as God, took back with Him our nature, which He had married into eternal union with Himself, and bore it, redeemed and resurrected, unto the very throne of God. May we not feel

THE DIGNITY OF REDEEMED HUMANITY?

Archbishop Manning once wrote that the Roman Catholic Church is the see or throne of the Holy Ghost during this dispensation; but we refuse to accept a system stained with the blood of martyrs, and spotted with nameless sins, as the seat of the pure Holy Ghost. We do hold, concerning the Church, as the Apostle uses the term in Ephesians—the body of Christ, composed of all believing souls—that this is the seat of the Holy Ghost; for "it sat upon each one of them." The Holy Ghost is as distinctly, actually, and specially in the church amid the world, until the Lord comes, as Jesus Christ was literally in the world during his incarnation. God's Holy Spirit is incarnate in that spiritual body, the Church, which is born of his own power, through his travail in the hearts of men: and in the presence of that living Spirit, is the secret of the Church's preservation amid many difficulties and of her constant renewal from within. What Eliezer was to Rebekah, the Holy Ghost, as the Paraclete and Advocate (John xiv. 16), is to the Church, bringing her from her native place, across the desert of time, and handing her over, at the second advent, perfected, to Christ, her Bridegroom.

With regard to the Church, the Holy Ghost is Teacher (John xiv. 26), Indweller (1 Cor. iii. 16, and Eph. ii. 22), and Ruler. He countersigns her decisions (Acts. xv. 28), sanctifies her with the washing of water by the Word, and glorifies Jesus Christ in her estimation. Beyond that, He teaches her to keep her eye fixed upon the east, where the dawn is glinting, while He whispers in and through her, "Come, Bridegroom of hearts."

For clearer vision of his office, in that respect, let us turn to the threefold groaning of Romans viii. 22-26. To Goethe, nature seemed to be like a fettered damsel, always sighing for release. Poor over-driven beasts of burden, weary and worn with journeys and with blows, for you, too. The pain of the vivisected animal, and the physical catastrophe of tornado and earthquake, all are vocal with that travail through which the new heavens and the new earth are being born. "Ourselves also which have the firstfruits of the Spirit"—an earnest of coming blessing for all the race, and a foretaste of heaven itself—"we groan within ourselves, waiting for our adoption, the redemption of our body," when spirit, soul, and body—one man—shall be completely emancipated from the power of corruption.

EMANCIPATION IS COMING

"In like manner the Spirit also helpeth our infirmity, for we know not how to pray as we ought; but the Spirit himself maketh intercession for us with groanings, which cannot be uttered." The word us, there, is not in the original; and the sense of the whole passage, therefore, is to be understood from the next verse, "He that searcheth the hearts knoweth what is the mind of the Spirit, because He maketh intercession for the saints according to the will of God." The Holy Spirit comes into our hearts, and yearns there after the saints, that is, for the completion of God's elect, for the making up of the entire body. Holy Ghost prayers are never selfish and egotistical, but we forget our own petty needs in great desires on behalf of the whole Church or body of Christ; and these desires are wrought in us by the groanings of the Spirit.

Thus there is a threefold groaning—the groaning of nature; the groaning of the saints; and the groanings of the Holy Ghost, in the saint, for the completion of the Church, or, if you will, for the coming of our Lord. Do you not perceive what light this throws upon that verse with which we started, Rev. xxii. 7? "The Spirit and the Bride say, Come." It is to witness with our spirits; and if you will only yield yourself to Him, quietly letting the fever of your soul subside, you will be conscious, as part of the Bride, that He is in you, yearning and appealing for the advent of your Lord. "And he that heareth, let him say, Come." Obviously, the rest of the verse is not addressed to Christ, but to those who are outside the Church—"And he that is athirst, let him come: he that will, let him take the water of life freely."

As we shall see, there is here no break in the sequence of thought. There is an appeal of the Spirit and the Bride to Christ, "Come quickly;" then there is an appeal of the Spirit and the Bride to thirsty ones. The advent of Jesus Christ waits until the Church is complete; and this it is that drives us into the highways and byways that we may gather in the unconverted. They who look for the coming of Christ are ever the most eager to win souls for Him; for, when the last soul has been gathered in to complete Christ's body, then He will come. When the Bride has become the wife, and is caught up to Christ, the new age begins, the conversion of the Jewish people takes place, and the fulness of the Gentiles is gathered in. So shall the wonderful typical picture of Genesis be fulfilled, wherein Joseph goes to Egypt, chooses a Gentile bride, discovers himself to his brethren, and makes provision for all the land.

Elisha, the Prophet of Vision.

VII.—The Faith of a Little Maid

(2 Kings v. 1-3).

By Rev. F. S. WEBSTER, M.A.*

THIS is one of the best-known of all the Bible stories. From childhood we have been familiar with its details. We are deeply attached to this impulsive general, of sterling character but many faults, and to the little maid who, though a caged bird, sang so sweetly the songs of Zion that she led her master into the liberty of the sons of God.

1. See the man whom God determined to bless. Naaman was a heathen. The spirit of the Gospel so pervades this chapter that we almost forget that it is part of the Old Testament. It shows us that the Jews, while the guardians of God's truth, were not meant to act as its gaolers. They were indeed severed from other nations, but it was to prevent error from entering in, not to prevent truth from passing out.

The Jews of our Lord's day had allowed zeal for God's truth to degenerate into bitter hatred of the heathen. They were filled with madness when our Lord, in his final sermon at Nazareth, reminded them of God's distinguishing grace to this heathen leper. And Naaman lived in the city of Damascus. Damascus had stood for some 1,100 years, and was enriched with the wealth and splendour of empires. God wanted a witness in that city, and so this heathen, dwelling amidst all the luxury of this heathen city, God determined to bless.

And he was one of Fortune's favourites. Everything had gone well with him. He was a man of many victories. "By him the Lord had given deliverance unto Syria." We can picture him as the dashing leader, open handed, open hearted, quick to take offence, but unable to bear malice. A hero with the people, and a favourite at court. One whose warm sympathies gained him the affection of all who came near him. This popular and successful man, who had all this world could give him,

GOD DETERMINED TO BLESS.

2. Mark the mysterious means adopted. Strong measures were necessary, for the favourites of fortune are not easily won. First of all Naaman was smitten with leprosy. It was the white kind, probably, the most hopeless and incurable. It put an end suddenly to his brilliant career. It brought despair to his wife and family. It was an intolerable burden, and the sympathy of friends only made it more galling to his pride. He thought his luck had turned, and everything was going wrong. He was mistaken. Things were being prepared for the making of his eternal happiness. Sometimes our greatest troubles are our chief mercies. But there was to be trouble and disaster in another quarter. A quiet country village on the borders of Palestine is disturbed by cries of alarm. A band of Syrian horsemen is seen approaching. The peasants flee in terror and hide among the hills. But some are captured, and amongst them a little maid. Her friends, perhaps her parents, return to find her carried off into slavery, and wish that she was rather dead than the prey of the infidel. But God was working his purpose out. The two desolate homes were no work of wantonness, they were both necessary to the Divine programme of blessing.

3. Consider the special instrument used. We love to dwell on the scene in Naaman's home. The little maid soon finds out that there are other troubles in the world besides her own, and quickly opens her heart to sympathize with her mistress. They are at needlework one morning, mistress and maid, both busy over some piece of tapestry, when suddenly the child lets the canvas drop, and, brushing away a tear, exclaims with a deep sigh, "Would God my lord were with the prophet that is in Samaria, for he would recover him of his leprosy." It was like the song of a nightingale from a distant grove, the first gleam of sunshine breaking in on the night of hopeless gloom. The house was full of idols. Sacrifices and libations without stint had been offered to gain the favour of the Syrian gods.

* Substance of an address in All Souls', Langham Place, on Friday morning, November 23.

But all in vain. Now this Hebrew child tells of the prophet who can save, of certain healing in her own land of Samaria. Her genuine sympathy, her unbounded confidence, could not be doubted. It was the artless, candid statement of a truthful child. It CARRIED CONVICTION TO ALL WHO HEARD IT.

See, then, the permanent results of early religious training. Whence came this assured faith, living on in a land of idols? It came surely from a father's teaching and a mother's prayers. The careful training of children in the fear and love of God is the first duty of the Church. It rests upon the parents, and to whatever extent their authority may be delegated to others, they cannot relieve themselves of one grain of their tremendous responsibility. One cannot conceive more poignant shame, more biting remorse, than that of those whose children have just cause to ascribe their irreligion and indifference to their parents' neglect. This captive maiden had been taught to know and trust God, and her bright faith brought salvation to the house of her captivity, and raised up a witness to God throughout the whole land of her exile.

4. But see the special character of a child's faith. It is so concrete and objective. It was the prophet who filled her area of vision. Though doubtless she knew well God's dealings in times past with her nation, the value of her religion was summed up in this: a prophet in Samaria who could raise the dead, heal lepers, or do anything. Little children cannot generally appreciate doctrine, but they can reverence and admire and love if a worthy object be held up before them. It is a tremendous testimony to Elisha's character and influence, that he had awakened such confidence in this little maid. There is something wrong in the teacher or preacher if he cannot enlist the enthusiastic love of the children. How real, too, a child's faith becomes, if the substance of the preaching is not the Church but the living Christ. And yet how easy to inculcate error, instead of faith, false confidence in crosses, and altars, and images, and relics, rather than trust in the unseen Saviour. The Jesuits boast that if they have the training of a child until seven or nine years of age, they do not mind what influences are brought to bear afterwards. This is because their soul-fettering superstitions are so connected with things visible and tangible, with concrete, not abstract, truth.

TO DEVELOP SUPERSTITION

Thank God the Bible is equally concrete. It is our fault, and a fatal source of weakness, if we spiritualize away heaven and hell, and the miracles of Bible history, and the life of Jesus Christ. Miracles are natural to children. When father and mother can do such wonders, it is obvious to their minds that God can do greater, dealing with laws and touching secret springs of influence unknown to the wisest men. This little maid was confident that Elisha could and would heal her master. That his disease was incurable, that he himself was outside the covenant of Israel, was nothing to her simple generous faith. A bigoted sectarian child is one of the saddest and most hideous monstrosities to be found on earth. Oh, for more of the child-spirit amongst Christians to-day! "A touch of nature makes the whole world kin." Real faith in a real God and a real heaven makes the whole Church one.

5. And notice how far-reaching may be the influence of the most insignificant child of God. This unknown maid would have been looked upon as the least influential person in all Damascus. Her simple testimony was the means of winning her master, who became a living witness for God to all Syria, and by her bright faith she has been preaching to millions of Bible students for the last 2,800 years. We shall all want to greet that little maid when we get to heaven. When Naaman left Damascus he took with him treasure amounting to £12,000 sterling. But he took with him what was of far more value, the prayers of that little maid. O children of God, live up to your high calling; confess in this, the land of your exile, that you are strangers and pilgrims, and tell out your faith in God, your knowledge of One who can save to the uttermost.

A Fireman Hero.

THE LIVING BRIDGE OF SALVATION.

A LITTLE over six years ago there was a fire in the Hotel Royale, in the City of New York.

"Help! Help!" was the cry, in agonized tones, from a group of stricken ones at one of the windows of an upper story in the hotel—a father, a mother, and their child, standing there facing an awful death.

"Courage! Wait quietly, and I think I can save you!"

O blessed words! They came from a sergeant of fire patrol, who was outside the next window in an adjoining building, and who had resolved to save these persons if he could.

"Don't attempt it!" cried voices from below, "the distance is too great." But with a hasty, heart-breathed prayer—"Lord, do Thou be my helper, or I cannot do it"—Sergeant John Vaughan threw himself down, resting one arm upon the window-sill and clasping a telephone wire with one of his legs. With his free arm he guided, one by one, the little group over his prostrate body, used as a bridge, to the window, which meant safety, next door.

The crowd yelled, the saved ones thought of their deliverer, and fell on each other's neck in a transport of gratitude; but John Vaughan's work was not yet done.

Standing on the roof John saw, in another portion of the burning building, a man standing on the sill of a window, torn by two conflicting, agonized ideas—to face death by fire, or to meet it in one terrible plunge?

"Wait, and I think I can save you!" shouted John Vaughan to the man. Then descending to the street he called to his comrades: "Follow me, men, and we shall save him yet!"

Then these men ascended to the roof of an adjoining house, and John, throwing off his coat, bade his comrades hold him by the legs, while he flung himself, head first, over the cornice. "Now, comrades," he cried,

"PULL STRONGLY AND STEADILY."

In this way he raised the almost hopeless man from the sill underneath, and by the help of his fellow workers, performed another deed of heroism and daring.

At the imminent risk of his own life—caring nothing for himself—he had saved those four others. "What made you think of it?" one asked him afterwards. "I did not think of it," replied John Vaughan. "The good hand of my God upon me enabled me to plan and do this thing." A short while afterwards there was a gathering of friends to present Sergeant John Vaughan, publicly, with a gold medal for his heroism. One of the speakers said: "In presenting Mr. Vaughan with this, we have been told that we are only rewarding a man for his duty. But our sergeant, in the name of duty, performed a Herculean labour of love; only love for his fellow-beings could have inspired him to act as he did that day.

Love—"the love of Christ which passeth knowledge—was the motive which led our Lord to give Himself, a sacrifice on the Cross, for a world standing on the brink of eternal death.

Fancy those persons, whom John Vaughan offered to save, meeting his offer with the reply—

"Oh, no; we do not believe you care enough for us to save us." Or, "Wait a little while, I am not quite prepared for so great a salvation." Or, perhaps, if the child had said: "Oh, I see the danger, but I am not old enough to be saved."

Think, think of the terrible death that would have been theirs! But they were willing to be saved; they trusted their self-appointed saviour, and he delivered them.

Are you willing to be saved by Christ when He says: "I am the Way (the living bridge between God and you), the Truth, and the Life. No man cometh unto the Father but by Me"?

Oh, that from each of my readers' hearts might arise the gentle whisper: "Lord Jesus, Saviour, I yield myself, my life to Thee."

Letters to the Editor.

The Dearth of Servants.

DEAR SIR,—I am sure most of your readers will have read the letter from "Sister Elizabeth," headed "Heaven—2s. a Day," with deep interest and sympathy, and I trust the outcome will be satisfactory. But there is apparently something very wrong in our social economy of the present day. In thousands of households there is now a great want of servants to assist in household affairs, and many are advertizing, answering advertisements, and appealing to friends to provide the necessary supply. Almost anyone, trained or untrained, tall or short, pretty or plain, will be gladly accepted, if they will only condescend to do a few hours' work daily; while from £20 to £30 a year remuneration, comfortable quarters, and wholesome food (say four or five meals daily?), will be provided, and any amount of consideration shown to their respective fancies! Christian readers are appealed to by "Sister Elizabeth" to "pity the sorrows of the poor when heaven comes down to 2s. a day!!" I do most sincerely pity them, but cannot help believing that a good many of these "poor" ones would be materially benefited if they would shake off their present surroundings and submit to domestic service, with good wages, plenty of food, comfortable quarters, and kind friends!—Yours truly,

A Householder.

Sunday Goods Trains.

SIR,—A series of inquiries set on foot—at the instance of the English Shareholders' Union—by M. Deluz, of the Geneva Lord's Day Society, has resulted in showing from the reports of the Swiss, Bavarian, and Belgian railways that the recent restriction or suppression of the ordinary Sunday goods traffic in these countries does not result in financial loss to the proprietors. In the statistics presented at the Paris Dominical Congress, held last month in the Exhibition buildings of that city, this fact was made quite plain. The road of Sunday reform has proved to be an entirely safe one, in spite of all predictions to the contrary. The increase of the tonnage of the goods carried has been found to be, since restriction was introduced into Switzerland, nearly 26½ per cent., and the receipts have gone up 25¾ per cent. For Belgium, the increase in the tonnage has been 20¼ per cent., and in the receipts 15⅓ per cent; and for Bavaria, 17½ per cent. in the number of tons conveyed, and 14¾ per cent. in the amount of money received.

If any shareholder or railway official would like to examine the tabulations on which these percentages are based, I shall be glad to send a printed copy. We do not doubt that facts of the character which are adduced will sooner or later influence the officials of British railway companies in connection with the diminution and suppression of the Sunday goods traffic in the United Kingdom.—Yours faithfully,

James Fox Wilson,
Secretary, Shareholders' Union for Defence of the Sabbath.

The Increase of Lunacy.—The recently published report of the Commissioners in Lunacy shows that the number of lunatics in these islands continues to increase, the total number in England and Wales on the 1st of January last being 106,611, nearly two thousand more than in the previous year. It has been stated that there are no less than 10,000 pauper lunatics in the one county of Lancashire, and Sir John Hibbert has asserted that the increase is due to a very great extent to excessive drinking. This makes another item for our national drink bill.

Performing Animals.—Under the title of "The Cruelties and Torture practised in Training Performing Animals," an article on the subject, by Mr. S. L. Bensuan, which originally appeared in the English Illustrated Magazine, has been republished in pamphlet form. The particulars given, of the torture to which animals are subjected in the course of training for performance in places of amusement, are terrible indeed. "Bruised, starved, and wounded," says the author, "animals in whose tricks humane people take delight, lead an existence that calls aloud for alleviation."

The Gospel in Finland.

In a recent statement bearing upon the present-day position of Protestantism in Finland, Mr. E. W. Lönnbeck said he was glad to be able to state that the Lutheran Church, deeply impressed with the threatening political outlook, is more and more awakening to a sense of its vast responsibilities and opportunities. The extremely grave and critical times through which the country is passing have had a sobering effect on the clergy, who possess an immense influence with the population, and the spiritual side of their manifold labours has been taken up with great earnestness and very encouraging results. Earnest exhortations to repentance, humiliation, and calling upon the Lord are frequent, and thus far the political trouble has, indeed, been

A SOURCE OF SPIRITUAL AWAKENING.

When we go back to the dawn of Christianity in Finland, we find a Briton, Bishop Henry, accompanying King Ericus IX. of Sweden on his crusade to Finland in the year 1157 as the first apostle to these troublesome savages. After him another Englishman, Bishop Thomas, was appointed the spiritual overseer of the Finns. The Nonconformists of Finland are chiefly Free Christians, Baptists, American Episcopal Methodists, and the Salvation Army. The worldly spirit which has crept into so many churches elsewhere, sapping the spiritual strength, is notably absent from these northern churches, where the members, as a rule, are few in number, but consistent. The Free Christians have never received any contributions from abroad in support of their missionary work; but the Baptist and Methodist Missions are mainly supported by subsidies from the United States.

Considering, then, that the Lutheran Church of Finland is thoroughly Evangelical in doctrine, and becoming more and more active in the propagation of Gospel truth and work; that the Nonconformists, not seldom aided by well-known preachers from Sweden, do an excellent spiritual work among all classes of people; and that the Finns, without exception, are dominated by very

it is but reasonable to think that this Evangelical people, by Providence placed as an outpost of Western thought and Protestant faith in the North, although few in number, and poor in everything that constitutes material strength and greatness, shall yet, by the grace of God, not only be able to uphold their Reformation faith and historic position against the whole force of Russian designs and pressure, but also extend the kingdom of Jesus Christ to those still sitting in darkness and in the shadow of death, proving that the Lord is still the Shield and Buckler of his people, who, through his love, are indeed "more than conquerors."

Referring to the position occupied by the Evangelical Alliance in the religious life and thought of Finland, Mr. Lönnbeck says:—"The ground being prepared by the revivals twenty years ago, and consequent intercourse with Swedish and British Christians, the new religious formations which then took place in Finland were from the commencement moulded according to New Testament principles, and upon the practical recognition of the unity of all believers in Christ, the Head.

"The first public token of these sentiments was the Monthly Alliance Prayer-meeting, held in Helsingfors at the end of 1883.

"About three years later, in 1886, we had the first great Alliance Conference in Finland, presided over by a Lutheran Bishop, and numerously attended from all quarters.

"Another point in this connection is the interchange of pulpits between preachers of different denominations that occasionally takes place, and the brotherly interest and assistance at Missionary Conferences and in times of revival that preachers and people from other Evangelical Churches usually display.

"Only last spring, when a revival broke out at a certain town, the Methodist pastor said to his flock: 'Now, as the Lord has sent a revival to the Free Church, come, let us put aside our own meetings for awhile, and go and help our brethren to pull the net ashore.'

"These evidences of Christian brotherhood, effort, and goodwill are mainly and primarily due to the British branch of the Evangelical Alliance."

The Bible in Korea.

I HAVE recently returned from an annual visit to Korea, in the interests of the Bible work. In no former visit have I been so deeply impressed with the rapidity and strength which has marked the growth of Christianity in that land. This has been due chiefly to the fact that I have for the first time visited Pyeng Yang, which is the centre of a most remarkable and successful work that is extending all over the northern part of the country.

Only five years ago, there was but a handful of believers in all this region, and persecution was still feared. But such has been the blessing of God upon the faithful and judicious efforts put forth for the spread of the Gospel, that there are now about 2,500 communicants, and the total of adherents is more than 10,000.

That the work is not superficial, but genuine, is demonstrated by the fact that beyond the support of the missionaries, but very little money from funds of the missions has been used. The native converts not only build their own churches, or chapels, but also pay the salaries of the evangelists and many of the helpers who are devoting all their time to their work.

One year ago it was decided that a new and large church was needed for Pyeng Yang, and the problem was how it could be built without considerable help from mission or other sources. With a membership of about 300, who are mostly people in but ordinary circumstances, it seemed impossible to raise enough to erect a building that would meet the demands of the field. But to the surprise of all, at a meeting in February last

THE NATIVES ALONE SUBSCRIBED

3,000 yen (or 1,500dols.), and it is expected that about all will be raised by themselves. What is also remarkable is that during the year contributions to the amount of 1,700 yen were made for other purposes.

The new church is being built on one of the finest sites in the city, and is so far completed as to be available for worship. On September 16 the first service was held in it, and although about a thousand were in attendance, it was not large enough to accommodate all who crowded around and eagerly sought for admission.

Many of the members live in the country, and are obliged to travel long distances in order to enjoy the privileges of the sanctuary. But the walk of ten or twelve miles is most cheerfully endured for the sake of the blessing which attends the hearing of the precious Gospel and the public worship of God.

So rapid has been the multiplication of believers that so far the care and instruction of the converts has fallen almost wholly upon the missionaries. It has been a great responsibility, and demanded extraordinary patience and wisdom. Providentially those who have been entrusted with these duties have been especially fitted for their work, and so far there has been the most perfect harmony and unqualified success.

In addition to the spread of Christian truth, there is also a wide-spread effort to promote the education and general welfare of the people. Self-supporting schools are springing up on every hand, and one of the most hopeful things for Korea is that the people may be elevated by the influence of such an education as will fit them for a higher and better place among the nations of the earth.

Armenian Perils.

In view of the recent trying experiences of Christian workers in Armenia, Miss Cantlow, secretary of Friends of Armenia Society, 47, Victoria Street, Westminster, S.W., writes:—

"The massacre at Spaghank, the attack on the British Consul at Van, and the raid on the Mission cattle near the same city, all prove that the Turkish authorities speak with their usual disregard of facts when they assert that 'the different elements of the population in Asia Minor are living in perfect harmony.'" An English lady who has gone out to Van to take charge of orphan children, gives gruesome details of the horrors which are perpetrated, even while in the public eye Armenian troubles are fading into seeming unreality. After recounting distressing experiences of the last few months, the writer says:—

They are building some new barracks here that may accommodate more soldiers, so the Turks went into a village close by to get wood. They were cutting down some trees, and the owners expostulated with them, whereupon they bound one to a tree after beating him, and two more they put down a "tong," and put the lid on. A "tong" is a place where bread is baked, a kind of deep stone well with a fire at the bottom. The fire was out when they were put in, but still very hot, and both were taken out in an exhausted condition.

The same week an Armenian had sold some sheep to pay a debt of £8. He was coming over the mountain in company with some Kourds, when they were all suddenly set upon by mounted Kourds, everything being taken from them and they left naked, with their hands, feet, and eyes tied up, while to make them more secure large stones were put on their chests so as almost to stop their breathing. Thus they were left on the very top of a mountain where there were bears and wolves. After a great struggle one managed to get free and help the others, when they met some villagers, who found something to cover them, and they returned to the city to inform the Government.

In the Van Orphanage several vacancies will be filled from the numbers who are pleading for admission, when funds permit.

Progress in Seville.

In a pamphlet issued by the Spanish Evangelization Society, Rev. Don Emilio Carreno relates particulars of the progress of Protestantism at Seville:—"Many who do not join themselves to us nevertheless appear to be losing the fear that formerly kept them from talking to and dealing with Protestants. They will even enter the Mission premises regardless of what people may say. Our schools are as prosperous as ever, though, of course, our adversaries work against us with all their might, sometimes using the thousand-and-one acts that Romanism is master of. A short time ago, for example, a little girl left a school kept by bigoted people and came to ours. The bigots found out what had happened, visited the mother, and promised not only to educate but to feed the child. The mother took it away, as might have been expected. Though we give neither food nor clothes, and the children pay for their schooling, our attendances are so large that the committee have granted us leave to rent an additional room to enlarge our accommodation."

From other centres of the Spanish Evangelization Society, encouraging reports are also received, and there are manifold signs of the awakening of an earnest spirit of inquiry for the truth. The hon. secretary in this country is Mrs. F. M. Graham, 16, Mayfield Gardens, Edinburgh.

Rev. Dennis Osborne.

Our readers will be interested to know that Rev. Dennis Osborne has arrived in Bombay, and that his first step on his return to India was to undertake a series of brief visits to famine-stricken districts.

Mr. Osborne writes: "The prospects are improving, but great scarcity still prevails, and multitudes are on relief. The weather is rapidly growing cold, and shelter, clothing, and covering are urgently called for wherever the poor orphans are congregated. We are earnestly looking for the winter rains, which, if timely and copious, will greatly relieve the situation."

THE LATE

Mrs. Bilbrough Wallace,

OF BELLEVILLE, CANADA.

IT was our sorrow, in September last, to hear of the decease of Mrs. Wallace, of Marchmont, Belleville, Ontario. For years she had toiled with signal devotion to bring the Gospel to the hearts and minds of English children in Canada.

ELLEN AGNES BILBROUGH WALLACE was the elder daughter of Brooks Priestley and Anne Bilbrough. Her grandfather, Rev. James Lister, was for many years pastor of the Myrtle Street Baptist Church, Liverpool.

She was converted as a girl at boarding school in Kelso, under the preaching of the late Dr. Horatius Bonar, who ever retained a deep and loving interest in her and her work. Under his influence she became a diligent student of the Bible, and was all through her beautiful life at once a humble learner and a successful teacher of the Word of God.

In 1869 she became deeply interested in the poor and neglected children of East London, and a valued co-worker with Miss Macpherson. In 1870 she went to Canada with Miss Macpherson and Mr. L. W. Thom, taking over the first band of orphan boys, to find happier homes and brighter prospects in the new land than they left behind in the old.

A Home was opened in Belleville, largely through the practical sympathy and kindness of the late Honourable Bella Flint, which, as the Marchmont Home, has been a home indeed to nearly 7,000 boys and girls, who found in Miss Bilbrough a warm, loving, motherly heart, that could love and sympathize with each one individually.

In 1887 Miss Bilbrough was married to Rev. Robert Wallace, who had been associated with her in the work since 1882. Since then the work has progressed with ever-increasing success and widening influence. This has notably been the case in regard to the development of the missionary spirit among the children, as well as among the workers.

Consecrated and devoted workers have been trained and sent forth to the foreign field. The late Rev. George H. Barrow, of the Canadian Baptist Foreign Missionary Society, laid down his life, after a few short years of work among the Telugus of India; and Miss Florence Sutton gave her life for China, after a still shorter term of service. Two others had to return to Canada from India on account of ill-health and other reasons, while two remain in the field—Mr. W. S. Horne, of the China Inland Mission, who went to China in 1888, and Rev. T. B. Scott, M.D., who is carrying on a large and successful work in Jaffna, Ceylon. Many others, both from among the co-workers and boys, are actively serving the Lord either in the ministry or other spheres of Christian service, who received much of their inspiration and encouragement from their beloved friend who has now been called to the higher service.

Mrs. Wallace caught a slight cold last summer, and although it was not thought to be serious, every effort was made to control and cure it. Two sanitariums were visited, and also the mountain region of Colorado, but all was unavailing to check the spread of the lung complications which supervened. Mrs. Wallace returned to the Marchmont Home, Belleville, on September 11, and the illness developed very rapidly. Two local doctors were called in, also a specialist from Toronto, but, despite all that love and skill could suggest, she gradually sank, and fell asleep in Jesus on Sunday morning, September 23.

Her funeral took place from Marchmont Home the following Tuesday afternoon. The attendance was very large and representative, expressive of the sincere respect in which she was held, and of the sympathy of the community with Mr. Wallace in his sad bereavement. Rev. V. H. Cowsert conducted the service, and addresses were delivered by Rev. C. W. Walch, speaking for her old personal friends; Rev. Dr. Tucker, of Showville, Quebec (one of her first boys from England), speaking for the nearly 7,000 children; Mr. H. W. Frost, for the China Inland Mission, a work in which she was deeply interested; and Mr. George Hague, the oldest trustee of the Home. Among the many friends from a distance were Messrs. W. H. Merry, of the Stratford Home, and A. Burgess, of the Brockville Home.

A noble and beautiful character was that of Mrs. Wallace—wise and womanly, generous and unselfish. She was endowed with an attractive personality, and had the gift of winning the warm love of all who came under her influence. Deeply sympathetic, she could enter into the joys and sorrows of others as few are able to do. She will be greatly missed by her large and scattered family of orphan children, and by a wide circle of friends. The text she chose for her last morning on earth was Rev. xxii. 4, "They shall see his face," and the last word she wrote in her diary was "Revival." The first is now blessedly realized by her before his throne. May the latter be graciously and abundantly vouchsafed to us who continue to serve!

"Praying Away" Bands.—Having regard to a recent notice of one of these societies, it is gratifying to learn that there are in association some thirty similar Bands, from all of which members are now labouring as missionaries abroad. From one Band of twelve, six have proceeded to South India, China, Persia, &c., while others are awaiting the call to join those who have already left for service in other lands. Particulars as to the formation of Bands will be given by Mrs. Tulloch, 50, Grange Park, Ealing, W.

Chamberi Mission, Madrid.

IT is a joy to invite the friends and helpers of this Mission to united in praise for another year of happy and fruitful service. From the chapel and schools in the street of Trafalgar No. 34, and another in the district of Pozas, no uncertain sound has gone forth, and with definite results, though we are still looking out for the greater harvest to the "precious seed" that has been tearfully sown alike in young hearts as in those of riper years. The enemy has also been active, for we know of strenuous efforts put forth to turn one and another aside by promises of improved temporal position, that proved successful in the case of two; but, thank God, the majority of the Christians have stood firm, some even "taking joyfully the spoiling of their goods."

The five day-schools have maintained their efficiency, with an average monthly attendance of 375, and the teachers' reports speak of many instances of marked encouragement. Constant visits to them, as well as to the parents and the Church members, have enabled me to gauge to some measure what has been effected, and we have often been cheered by the spontaneous expressions of thankfulness for what the Gospel had done for them and for their children, and their changed condition, as of their homes, testify to the old truth, "If any be in Christ, he is a new creature."

Three additions have been made to the church, one of the number being a former scholar, and several whom we do not doubt have received Christ will shortly take their place amongst his people: one of these has also been educated in our schools. One member, a stonemason, is a diligent tract distributor; during a prolonged strike, when he was hard pressed, we never heard a complaining word, but he occupied his enforced leisure by gathering together his fellow-workmen, to whom the way of salvation; this brother frequently brings others to the services.

Another, a sister, writes letters of earnest Gospel entreaty, and either through the post or by hand gets them to those who perhaps would never hear otherwise the simple truth of God's pardoning love and mercy; this earnest worker was amongst the first converted in the year 1873, the year this mission was commenced.

A third shows her piety in a very practical way; she is a laundress with a little family, but is always ready to help both with her means and working for others; she recently visited a poorer sister who had given birth to her infant under very trying circumstances, and in addition to pecuniary aid offered her services gratuitously whilst the mother was laid aside. There is every reason to believe that her eldest child, still attending school, is converted, and the teacher thinks her younger sister is also a little Christian.

Don Mariano Trancho, for many years engaged in the boys' school, is now my fellow-helper; he gives the daily Scripture lesson in the school, superintends the Sunday schools, and spends the rest of his time visiting, reading, and expounding the Scriptures.

One word as to finance: the nine teachers are partly supported by the scholars' fees, that amounted last year to £250 odd; for the remainder they, with Don Mariano, as myself, look to Him, whose we are and whom we serve, to incline his people's hearts to help. The past year has been one of much exercise of soul, owing to the continued straitness of funds. Actual needs have, however, been met, but retrenchment in some directions has been necessary, one of these being the suppression of the usual annual report. Kind helpers by prayers and gifts will understand and accept our grateful thanks for their continued love and sympathy. CHAS. E. FAITHFULL.

Special Christmas Mission Supplement.

For God and the Gospel!

The late (7th) EARL OF SHAFTESBURY, K.G.: "From long experience of the work of this Mission I would bear my testimony to its real value. It is conducted with earnestness, piety and zeal. OF ALL THE ASSOCIATIONS IN LONDON, I DO NOT KNOW OF ONE MORE DESERVING OF COMMENDATION AND SUPPORT."

The late Mr. C. H. SPURGEON: "There will be no uncertain sound in the rooms, halls, or tents which this brother uses as gathering places for hearing the Gospel. He has worked on for many years with a faith and patience which command our hearty esteem."

THE EVANGELISTIC MISSION

For the past thirty-five years this UNSECTARIAN MISSION has been successfully working among the masses in London and the provinces by means of GOSPEL SERVICES IN HALLS, THEATRES, TENTS, and in the OPEN AIR including several buildings erected by this Mission).

Its operations extend over a wide field, both among young and old, having large SUNDAY SCHOOLS, MOTHERS' MEETINGS, CHILDREN'S SERVICES, BAND OF HOPE, DORCAS MEETINGS, CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOUR SOCIETY, COLPORTAGE MISSION, with an extensive circulation of Gospel Literature at home and abroad, HOUSE OF REST for Christian Workers (St. Leonards), with various PHILANTHROPIC AGENCIES among the necessitous poor.

Many converts under this Mission have been trained thereby for work abroad, and are now serving God as Missionaries in heathen and other lands. Christians of all denominations are earnestly invited to assist its funds, as the Mission is entirely dependent on voluntary contributions.

OUR RESCUES FROM THE STREETS ON A SINGLE DAY.

Scouring the Streets.

By T. J. BARNARDO.

THE above describes in a phrase the process which the Homes under my care have been carrying on for more than thirty-four years. What we have accomplished in the way of the prevention of "Hooliganism" probably the Stipendiary Magistrates at the various police courts of London and of the great provincial towns could best tell. When these have had before them, for loafing and vagrancy, young fellows of from fifteen to eighteen, whom they were reluctant to send to prison, and for whom no other door was open, they have turned to our Homes as affording almost their sole remaining chance of rescue. I remind the readers of THE CHRISTIAN of this fact now as a slight contribution to the rising tide of controversy over the Hooligan problem. For the solution of the latter I have no panacea, no "pill to cure earthquakes," no short and easy method with that unlovely product of our modern street life. But this contribution I would at least offer to the discussion of the large and complicated matter. It may sound like an Irish bull, but my long experience has taught me that it is British common sense: Catch your Hooligan before he is made! Prevent him, for you will find it difficult to cure him! And I assert that in rather more than nine cases out of ten it is not merely possible but comparatively easy to make out of the lad on his way to Hooliganism a self-respecting, useful man, if you can only catch him early enough!

In one of our London Homes I have, within the past nineteen years, passed through my hands over 6,000 big lads of between seventeen and twenty years of age. What were they? The great majority were young fellows saved from the "danger line"; honest enough, perhaps, therefore not criminals, but living in evil conditions, amidst great temptations, ready to be bid for, body and soul, by the Devil! Poor of course, destitute most of them, with the plea in their mouths, "No man hath hired us"; just at the momentous crisis in their career when a touch, to all human seeming, will mean their salvation or their destruction! Which is it to be? And our Youths' Labour House steps in with its open door, with its hearty invitation, with its appeal to the better part. It gives them a little, but it gives them "a chance," and it promises them much. It supplies plenty of hard work, abundance of plain food, a bed, and a roof to cover them. And then it says, "Now, see what you make of your opportunity." A month or two soon tells its story; and then, if the tests are satisfactorily passed, there lies before each and all of these young fellows the BOUNDLESS POSSIBILITIES OF COLONIAL LIFE.

I have just returned from a long tour in Canada, where I have seen and conversed first and last with hundreds of young men who were once inmates of the Labour House, and, further back still, living, many of them as "corner boys," in destitution and temptation, unattached lives upon the streets of English, Scotch, and Irish cities. I assert, and I have the official view of Canada to back my assertion, that these young men are now self-respecting, respected citizens of that great country. They are honest, upright, law-abiding. I aver, too, that many of them are leading God-fearing, consistently Christian lives. And I point to these as examples of what can be done by wise and careful efforts to prevent Hooliganism and to turn its misdirected energies into the right channels. Over 11,500 emigrants have now gone forth from us to people our Colonies. Of these some 7,000 were boys and lads, and some 4,000 were great youths sent out from the Labour House. Among the latter not eighty failures are registered, less than 2 per cent. That is a record not to be ashamed of, and one that might well be pondered by social economists, by politicians, and by Christian citizens who are perplexed, alarmed, and anxious at the increase of Hooligans in our midst.

A Waif's Conversion.

Let but one incident illustrate the Divine possibilities of this work of human redemption. When William Jones, a homeless street wanderer, applied for admission to our Youths' Labour House, he was over seventeen years of age, stunted in growth, but possessed, nevertheless, of a supple, well-knit frame, and a face remarkable for intelligence, illuminated with large, deep, brown lustrous eyes. He had walked all the way from Hull. His father and mother, according to his story, were dead—the father seven years ago. Of his mother he remembered nothing. On the death of his father he went to work with a farmer, with whom he remained for a short time; subsequently he was employed by a mill-owner, and managed to get a kind of living for himself by doing odd jobs for short terms at small pay.

At length even this failed him, and he tramped to London. Two nights he spent in the casual wards. That was when he failed to pick up even a penny on the streets with which to pay for a share of a corner in some "furnished room"; but on several occasions, when more successful, the common lodging-house gave him a refuge for the night. Sometimes he was indebted for shelter to the goodness of a poor woman, who allowed him to sleep in the passage in front of her own miserable tenement, and who in many ways showed an interest in the lad, giving him scraps of food, and once or twice stitching his rags together.

The young fellow was almost starving when he came to my door. I admitted him, pending inquiries into his story, and after I had ascertained, by careful inquiry, that his statement was correct, he became an inmate of the Youths' Labour House, where there were then resident over a hundred stalwart fellows, between seventeen and twenty years of age, every one of whom had been taken destitute and homeless from the streets.

A very blessed spiritual work was just then being carried on in that particular House. A mighty wave of conversion was rolling over boys and masters, so that the voice of prayer was heard in the small hours of the morning and late at night. Every moment that could be obtained from duty, or pleasure, or work was eagerly seized for the reading of the Bible by the lads themselves.

Shortly after William entered the Home, he came under the gracious influences which were at work, and speedily gave marked evidence of his conversion to God. Never in all my experience have I had to do with a lad whose influence over his mates, and whose own private life, appeared to be so marvellously penetrated by the Spirit of God. Such a humble, gracious, godly testimony as his was like a silver trumpet blowing its clarion notes in the hearing of all he met. Nor was such testimony in vain. William became a leader in the prayer meetings. His little Bible was always either in his hands or inside his jersey. Do not imagine that at this time he neglected duty, or failed to perform his hard and sometimes disagreeable tasks. Not so. William was "diligent in business" as well as "fervent in spirit." I delighted to talk to the lad; in fact, I never came into contact with this poor young fellow, snatched from the streets, and now so manifestly under the influence of reigning grace, without getting good to my own heart.

Twice I was present at what the young fellows called their "testimony" meetings. On these occasions the Christian lads rose one after the other, as they felt disposed, and testified to the grace of God, or engaged in prayer on behalf of their comrades. William's testimony often broke us down. There was hardly any listening to it with a dry eye. I never heard a lad pray with such fervour, such manifest access to God, such prevailing power! One night a friend present jotted down a few sentences from William's testimony, given at a crowded meeting of his mates and others. I am indebted to him for the following extract:—

"I owe everything to the Home, and I thank God I ever entered it. Mates, food and clothes are good things for a starving lad; but, praise God, I've got what won't ever wear out, when clothes are in rags, and even if I 'am starving again. Now Christ is mine, and I am his; and when I think of his mercy in forgiving my many sins, and cleansing my wicked heart, I haven't words enough to thank Him with; and feel I would like to spend my life serving Him."

Imagine a boy in his surroundings beginning to study such a book as Leviticus, and having his mates around him, often before five in the morning, or at odd moments in the day, while they pored over their Bibles! To give an example of his intelligence as to Divine things, and of his simplicity, let me mention an incident. One Sunday night at the Edinburgh Castle I was preaching upon the cleansing of the leper, as set forth in the fourteenth chapter of Leviticus. Among my audience were this lad and about twenty or thirty others who were known at this time to be serving the Lord. I did my best to make the subject clear, but naturally I almost forgot the boys, and spoke chiefly to the immense adult audience before me. When the meeting was over I saw the lads going out, and reaching the door I touched William's shoulder and said, "Well, my lad, I fear you did not get much to-night." His eyes beamed with intelligence and pleasure. "Didn't I, sir?" he replied; "I got a lot. It was fine." "But, William," I asked, "was it not too difficult for you?" "No sir," he said, "I understood it all; in fact, I never understood about them two ducks before!" And then he told me how he and his mates had been diligently perusing that very chapter a few days previously. Now, he said, he understood about "them two ducks," and I really believe he did, for I heard much afterwards of the spiritual results of the lessons he had learned.

An "In and Out."

One has often enough heard of "ins and outs" in connection with the Workhouse, and of knowing the "ins and outs" of a certain complex business or trade, but very few readers of these pages, I venture to say, know all the "ins and outs" of the life of a street arab in any one of our great cities!

When the majority of respectable citizens are snug in bed, the right hour has come to seek keenly for the youthful "flotsam and jetsam," unfortunately much more abundant nowadays than some people imagine, in order that it may be rescued by the right means from the general wreckage of human life in the slums. At such an hour we find numbers of promising young fellows in very strange places, and often under startling circumstances. At one of our northern branches, a youngster of fourteen, whom we will call Rodney Stone, was one of the waifs recently discovered late at night.

Rodney had at all times been a picker up of "unconsidered trifles." He also loomed large on the streets during daylight as a paper-boy, and when night came he slept "where he could," for he was never able to afford the luxury of a common lodging-house. One of his favourite night haunts was a dustbin, but a more roomy and delightful shelter was

A DISUSED DOG KENNEL.

Rodney was a sturdy little chap, and had no sentimental notions upon the subject of either dustbin or kennel—both were handy, and would do at a pinch, if only "them blessed p'lice would let a chap alone." And yet Rodney had a mother, and she had a room somewhere hard by where she and Rodney's two young sisters lived. But of that mother and her room we can say nothing satisfactory. Meanwhile the police did not leave Rodney alone. Indeed they seemed to give him very special attention.

Once lately, Rodney was locked up for sleeping out. The next morning at the police court the ragged little urchin could just pop his head up over the dock now and then, not understanding, but curiously observing the proceedings. "This boy, your worship," said the clerk, addressing the Alderman then on the bench, "was found last night by P.C. —— sleeping in a dustbin. His mother occupies one room; the children were found to be wretchedly clad; the room was dirty and verminous, and without an article of furniture; the bed was on the floor, and practically without covering. The mother was some time ago ejected by the landlord without an ejectment order. All the trifling things belonging to her were put in a back yard, where she and the children remained from 11 a.m. to 7 p.m. Eventually, by the help of neighbours the nails of the back window were knocked out, a mattress was got in, the fire was lighted, and they re-occupied their wretched tenement." The officer proceeded to detail how that the mother said she was a hawker, and that her husband was dead two years ago, but the facts under the notice of the police proved her life to have been vicious and immoral for years.

The magistrates treated Rodney leniently, and gave him another chance, and he resumed his mode of "living anyhow." But again he was caught sleeping out, and this time two constables found him sleeping in the dog kennel already referred to. The magistrates thought that it was best that Rodney should knock at our Ever-Open Door. He did so, and was forthwith admitted. Rodney was as proud as a peacock—pathetically proud!—at having at length a roof to cover him. "It's a heap better than a dust-bin," was his considered judgment after a night's rest in one of our beds. Notwithstanding his poverty, rags and dirt, Rodney had a strong, "canny" face, which could deepen into a sullen sternness as it could broaden out into a bright, breezy laugh. One of his eyes was badly injured, and this gave him a sinister expression which belied his real cheerfulness. When captured, this jovial little arab was very ragged, shoeless, and dirty, and such an object of commiseration was he, that a poor labouring man, seeing the shivering, shoeless urchin trudging along in the snow beside one of our agents, gave the boy 2½d. from his own scanty store. Chuckling, Rodney said, "Guv'nor, I'm in luck at this town. This makes 4½d. I got." Our agent smiled, and said that he would be luckier still when he got to London.

We have all heard of the man who graduated from "Log Cabin to White House." Who can tell but that this waif from Sunderland may yet, with God's blessing, grow into a man of whom it may be said that he was snatched "From a dog kennel to a noble career"? But while we thank God for his rescue, let us not forget that Rodney has thousands of little brothers and sisters in this "Merrie England" of ours as forlorn and desolate as he was, awaiting the hand outstretched to save!

Little Peggy's Story.

If boys seldom pass through the furnace unscathed, owing to evil conditions and surroundings, assuredly that furnace is "heated seven times" for girls! We have often been driven to reflect that only by God's special and providential interposition could some of the little girl waifs who enter our doors have been preserved from the destroyer.

Such a one is little Peggy: a child of neglect, only eight years old! Hers is one of the too sad histories that can never be told in all its fulness. I need say no more than that poor Peggy was farmed out soon after her birth to a dirty and drunken couple. For a while four shillings weekly were paid for Peggy's keep, and then quietly and finally the wretched mother disappeared! She doubtless hid herself in this huge city of ours where concealment is easier than in an African jungle. Her whereabouts have never been discovered. The so-called foster-father and mother "led a wandering life." That means so much and so little! Hawking, begging, stealing, odd-jobbing, and above all, drinking and living on the seamiest side of life, are all elements in it. Not unfrequently Peggy had to make acquaintance with casual wards, tramps' lodging-houses, and free shelters, and sometimes even had to "doss in the open." Who can wonder at the child's stamp of utter neglect?

But at last one night the couple who took her about separated, and the woman, with Peggy, applied at one of our Open All Night Shelters for Women and Children. Here an earnest attempt was made next morning, and not in vain, to snatch Peggy from the street life to which she had been apparently doomed. From the Night Shelter to the Village Home is but a short journey, though the chasm dividing both is so deep and wide, and Peggy soon became one of our family of happy girls safe in the Essex village. Thank LITTLE PEGGY, AGED 8.

God, the little one was saved, and to-day she is as bright and promising as any one of the 1,000 girl inmates of our Village Home!

Some Results.

The outcome of all this "Scouring of the Streets," with its rescue, body and soul, of great youths, of younger lads, and of girls of any age, is, that already there have been rescued 41,800 such, who have been brought within the shelter of the Homes, educated, trained and for the most part placed out in life. Of these, as has already been said, 11,566 have, after training, been emigrated, while over 24,000 have found service in England, or were sent to sea, or otherwise provided for. And there remain this day in the Homes, to be fed, clothed, and cared for, no fewer than 5,390. During the current year we have maintained the Great Family of 7,400. On an average we have admitted fifty-eight new cases every week, so that the total fresh admissions for 1900 are 3,060. If to these are added the admissions of last year, it will be seen that we have in two years admitted no less than 6,071 fresh cases, a total probably never before attained by any single set of Institutions in the world in the same period of time! To God be all the praise and glory, and to his people our hearty thanks for all their loving help and practical sympathy! I am assured that continued help will not be wanting at the present season, when, owing to the empty condition of the treasury, a severe strain is thrown upon every department of our work. Gladly will I hear from any readers of these pages who may be willing to co-operate.

"Familiar With Disfavour."

THOSE best acquainted with mission work know well how uninviting it is in many of its phases and branches. The poor are so very poor, the ignorant are so very ignorant, the degraded are so very degraded, and the helpless are so very helpless. Every worker who is in earnest, and who labours on year after year, often does so with a burdensome feeling of his own weakness, and an inclination to ask himself repeatedly, "Who is sufficient for these things?"

And yet mission workers have their compensations and rewards, as God works through them, crowning their efforts with success, and raising up the fallen amongst whom they labour to positions of respectability and usefulness.

Such rescued lives are "God's modern miracles," and of such miracles possibly no mission can speak with more knowledge and authority than the

ST. GILES' CHRISTIAN MISSION,

with the operation of which most of our readers have been long familiar. The arm of mercy it extends is long enough to reach the most erring and wretched, and it spares no effort to help and comfort those, who in Longfellow's touching words,

> Hear the sounds of doors that close,
> And of feet that pass them by,

and who have long "grown familiar with disfavour," so painfully familiar that many of them have learned to consider such disfavour as their inevitable lot and portion.

But these "homeless poor" must be taught otherwise, and made to understand by prompt, practical assistance and guidance, that

> There is a way for man to rise
> To the Divine abode;
> An offering and a sacrifice,
> A Holy Spirit's energies,
> An Advocate with God.

As we said before, the work is in a certain sense most uninviting, and it is easy to turn away from the poor, heedless of their terrible need; and yet in their pleading the attentive ear can hear Christ saying:

> Whatsoever thing thou doest
> To the least of mine and lowest,
> That thou doest unto Me.

While it is true that the Mission relieves constantly and to a large extent the bodily needs of the hungry and destitute, it is to be remembered that the workers place great emphasis upon the importance of leading the poor to Christ as their Saviour.

The reformation of juvenile offenders and discharged prisoners are amongst the aims of the Mission, and from long experience it has been found that "the soul of reformation is the reformation of the soul."

At this season of the year the workers are busy in providing food, firing, clothing, and Christmas dinners, for the poor. As the Mission has been in existence forty-one years, and has always kept in close touch with the needy by means of house-to-house visitation, it will be readily seen that money is not wasted upon the undeserving, but is expended for the benefit of those who are known by the visitors to be worthy. Many destitute will be remembered in the distribution, and their hearts will be cheered in their bodily and mental distress by the gifts the subscribers enable the workers to dispense.

The Mission's operations are so large and many, that it is imperative that at least £3,000 should be contributed before the end of the year if the accounts are to be closed with a balance on the right side of the books. We hope that those who believe in the Gospel, and love that Saviour who was so tender to the poor, will come to Mr. Wheatley's help by sending their gifts, either in money or kind, either to us, or to him at his office at 4, Ampton Street, Regent Square, London, W.C. "He gives twice who gives quickly."

WHAT THE MAGISTRATES THINK.

Among annual functions of a social character, the festival of the St. Giles' Christian Mission has a peculiar attraction by reason of the demonstration it affords of the successful application of Gospel methods to the problem of reclaiming the criminal classes.

The gathering on Thursday evening last at the Mission Chapel in Little Wild Street, Drury Lane, was characterized, as usual, by pointed testimonies of the Common Law as to the value of the work, as well as by words of encouragement to those who have been the recipients of help.

The evening's proceedings more than justified the genial optimism of Mr. W. Wheatley, the esteemed superintendent. The report of the past year, pithily put by Alderman T. Vesey Strong, told of continued usefulness in the varied ramifications of the work; in the relief of the deserving poor; the assistance of discharged prisoners; the reception of juvenile offenders saved from the prison taint and provided with employment; the assistance of wives and children of prisoners; the training of fallen and destitute women for domestic service; and the provision of holiday and convalescent homes for the sick poor.

The branch which comes most prominently before the public is, of course, that which deals with friendless juvenile offenders, and the army of young people, bright and intelligent, neatly dressed, and entering jubilantly into the spirit of the gathering, who occupied the major portion of the building, spoke more eloquently than many speeches of the blessing which has been given. Many of these are now occupying capital positions, deserving and receiving every consideration and confidence from their employers. In this connection it is interesting to note that speak in high terms of the efforts put forth to help this class of law-breakers. Nor are these efforts, and those in behalf of older offenders, without their direct effect in reducing our prison population. The number of prisoners committed to prison on indictment during the past twenty years has decreased 22 per cent. absolutely; 33.8 per cent. relatively to population; and the number of these committed summarily has decreased 1.9 per cent. absolutely; and 16·9 per cent. relatively to population.

Speaking from the chair, Sir Franklin Lushington recognised the valuable aid afforded by the Society to law officers in dealing with criminals. At the psychological moment, when the need is greatest, the Society's workers come to the rescue, and the repentant offender is transfused with new ideas. The 400,000 breakfasts which have been given mean as many straight talks and offers of help.

Mr. Wheatley traced the origin of the work to the retort of some criminals, who said, "What's the use of preaching; why don't you help us?" Proceeding to review the work and summarize the present position, Mr. Wheatley gave good accounts of the progress of some tough characters lately received from the London County Sessions House and the police-courts, but was obliged to announce a considerable financial deficit. The speaker took occasion to protest against the in the Press, and said that the use of the correct phrase, "young roughs," would tend to lessen the importance of these disturbers of the peace. Mr. Wheatley concluded by reading an encouraging message from Dr. Anderson, Assistant Commissioner of Metropolitan Police.

Mr. W. R. McConnell, Q.C., chairman of the London County Sessions, referred in terms of gratitude to Mr. Wheatley's readiness to accept even the most hopeless cases; and Mr. R. Loveland-Loveland, deputy chairman, said that magistrates feel bound to help the Mission, for the Mission helps them so extensively and so well.

Other speakers included Mr. R. O. B. Lane, Q.C., the well-known metropolitan magistrate, and Lieut-Col. Arthur Rotton, while a pleasing feature was the distribution, by Lady Lushington, of rewards to young men and women, formerly inmates of the respective Homes, who have conducted themselves well in situations. The occasion was bright with hope, emphasizing, as it did, that the end aimed at is not merely outward reformation, but spiritual regeneration.

A Terror to Evil-doers.

A GOOD report comes from the office of the National Vigilance Association. An extract will sample the instructive character of the whole.

The year has been a prosperous one: plenty of work, fair success, fair support. They feel that the Association is growing stronger, not weaker, that its position is better established, it reputation higher; the public confidence in its work more general and better informed. Years ago it had great difficulties to face—the disinclination of the public to recognise the extent of the evils which the Association exists to deal with, to face the facts and bravely put in force remedies; the lazy disposition to acquiesce in evil for want of resolution to attack it; the suspicion of a Society which investigates and searches out, and so may come upon no one knows what. Gradually, however, the public have come to discover that this Association is wisely as well as resolutely conducted, that it is not a manufacturer of scandal, that it deals with crime and vice in a business-like spirit, with a view not so much to expose as to secure justice and virtue,

TO PREVENT AS WELL AS TO PUNISH

All the same, the very basis of the work of the Association is Law. There are other societies which devote themselves exclusively to reclaim the fallen. They have a certain defect of one-sidedness. Their danger is that they do little or nothing to prevent the recurrence of vice and crime. Now vice is not always crime, but it always tends towards it; and the law gradually moves up to meet the tendency, and enlarges the action of criminal jurisprudence, as the growing sense of justice leads the community upwards. This Association was originally founded mainly with a view to the enforcement of new legislation, which extended the protection of the magistrates to young girls in cases which previously, however wicked, were not actually illegal, and also struck more severely than before at those who

FOR THEIR PROFIT, TEMPT TO VICE.

The general business of the Association has proceeded with increasing power during the year on which the committee are reporting. The run of cases in the office has been constant as usual, and it is necessary for the officers to select carefully those on which they think their labours should be spent. Persons in distress of all kinds come in, often with the vaguest of ideas as to the nature of the Association, and only having been told, perhaps by a perfect stranger, that in moral matters help is to be got at the Office—or at an office of which they know neither the place nor the name, but which by sedulous inquiry they ultimately locate as that of the Vigilance Association. This general notoriety, if sometimes embarrassing, is of course of the utmost value. It is enough if the betrayed and defenceless know that help is to be got, if they look for it; it is very often enough for the betrayer and miscreant to know that there is a vigilant eye whose glance may fall his way.

The General Secretary of the Society is Mr. W. Alex. Coote, and the office is at 319, High Holborn, W.C.

East London Hospital for Children.—Among the numerous organizations in East London having for their object the amelioration of sickness among the poor, this institution ministers to the needs of suffering children. On an average 1,500 boys and girls are admitted annually to the wards of the hospital, and 320 are subsequently sent to the seaside branch. Over 30,000 children receive attention in the out-patient and casualty departments. Copies of the annual report may be obtained from the secretary, Mr. Thos. Hayes, who may be addressed at the hospital, Shadwell, E.

Mr. F. N. Charrington's Work.

TOWER HAMLETS MISSION.

ONE whole year has elapsed since we had the privilege of bringing the above branch of service before the kind readers of The Christian; a year which has held within its records some of the most eventful circumstances concerning our Empire at large, as well as the whole world. War, plague, pestilence, famine, fire, and flood have deluged humanity; and changes of all kinds, political and national, have often made one pause to ask, "What next?" But amid all this change, amid all these catastrophes, one unchanging fact has lived to force itself upon our notice, and that is the condition of the poverty-stricken around us. The same thousands of men, women, and children for whom the Mission has to try and secure, even the means of existence. Firing to be found for shivering families, where the suffering of little children for want of it cannot be described, resulting in so many serious maladies which sap their young life, and fill the hospitals with invalids, the cemetery with tiny coffins. Boots and shoes have to be found for bare and bleeding feet; clothing for young and old; rent to keep a shelter overhead, when illness or scanty work has made it impossible to meet the landlord's claims; a little fresh air in the country, or at the seaside, to try and recruit health that is almost poisoned out of these poor people; and other innumerable demands.

But there is another side of even still more importance, the caring for the eternal welfare of the souls of the sin-stricken ones! Like the malarial fever of insanitary Africa, which soaks into every fibre and nerve of the body, eventually dealing death, is the malaria of their

MORAL AND SPIRITUAL SURROUNDINGS.

Packed together with scarcely room to breathe, in dwellings which are a disgrace to the reigning metropolis of the world, they have no escape from hearing the same evil words, seeing the same evil practices—hopeless and helpless!

In looking back upon those long years' experience of Mr. Charrington's efforts for the reformation of the Mile End in his district, my astonishment grows that he and his life-long helper, Mr. Kerwin, and the other dear workers connected with this Mission have survived this struggle during thirty years' residence, never giving in, never lying idle except when prostrated by illness, and again resuming their colossal task when convalescence permits. It is a grand and glorious fight against all the powers of evil which beset humanity, where nearly every street corner is marked by which the law has licensed to ply its vile traffic even on the Lord's Day, to the destruction of soul and body.

For over 9,000 consecutive nights have the walls of the Great Assembly Hall echoed to the Gospel message and the Gospel hymns; it is like a spiritual sanatorium for the poor sin-sick men and women who crowd in out of the streets, where they can at least rest their wearied bodies, and where they must hear the good news of salvation through Christ for the vilest. It is no half-and-half Gospel that is preached; it is the best antidote to "Hooliganism," even better than the "cat," so wisely recommended for that epidemic, for it reaches the souls of these outcasts, and many a prodigal one has been saved and healed within those precincts, as well as in the large tent lately erected at the side for summer meetings. The past year has been one of unparalleled difficulty for the Mission owing to the many great public calls which have drained out and though faithful friends have done their best, still the deficit is great, and both Christmas and winter are at the door.

THE USUAL CHANNELS OF HELP;

You all know Mr. Charrington long enough to feel that through no better hands could you contribute your quota to the Lord's cause.

The Evening of Life.

NINETY-THREE years ago, the Aged Pilgrims' Friend Society was instituted for the purpose of assisting the aged Christian poor of both sexes, and of every Protestant denomination, who are not under sixty years of age, and who give Scriptural evidence that they are of "the household of faith." Like so many other institutions, the Society originated through that revival of the spiritual life of the churches which resulted from the preaching of George Whitefield and other ministers of Christ.

Mr. Alderman and Sheriff Alliston, at a recent meeting, said:—"The Society pensions are most acceptable to the recipients, forming as they do a little pivot upon which home life can be sustained." Throughout the Metropolis, and in many other places, the pensions are paid monthly through Christian friends; in other cases they are remitted quarterly. Every effort is thus made to exclude formality, and to make the work a bond uniting in sympathy and fellowship givers and receivers.

in all parts of the country are upon the books, and upwards of £11,500 per annum are expended in pensions, and £2,000 in maintaining the Homes and the Coal and Benevolent Funds in connection with them. An expenditure of £36 daily has therefore to be met, and the ordinary income is inadequate to do this.

The Ven. Archdeacon Madden said last year: "In ministering to the needs of the aged Christian poor, this Society makes a unique claim upon all who love the Lord Jesus in sincerity and in truth. To all who have stood beneath the Cross of Jesus, and have felt the power of his dying love, this Society says: 'These men totter to their grave: these women, weak, sad, and sorrowful, are your brethren and sisters—part of the one family. Let us in the evening time of their lives bring into their homes and hearts gleams of light and love, that they may take courage and know that the Lord reigneth, and will not let his people want.'"

With steadfastness of purpose have many of the recipients worked at their several occupations until compelled to desist by increasing infirmities. Letting apartments, needle-work, and dress-making, have had to be relinquished by the women; and farm labour, shoe-making, and various trades by the men. Some lost their little all through the failure of the "Liberator," and to all these the hand of the Society has been instrumental in conveying welcome help.

WHAT A PATHETIC MEANING

there is in these few words from a candidate in Cornwall: "My eyesight is failing and the tailor's work is too dark for me." An aged friend in London was living upon the gradual sale of her goods, when the bestowal of the pension saved her home from complete wreck.

An excellent couple in Wiltshire, both of whom are on the pension list, have been married fifty-seven years, and still live in the cottage which they first occupied fifty-four years ago. Another pensioner has for upwards of twenty years been a Bible woman; she now waits upon an invalid of very slender means. The most venerable pensioner passed away in January, aged 101, retaining her mental faculties to the end. Among the last words of another were, "I see thy chariot wheels moving; I am coming, O Lord."

These are a few glimpses of the character of those assisted by the Society, and who, but for its aid, would have to seek a shelter in the workhouse. The four Homes, situated respectively at Camberwell, Hornsey Rise, Stamford Hill, and Brighton, accommodate 180 of the pensioners, and are open to visitors daily (Sundays excepted).

The secretary of this work, which must commend itself to every Christian heart, is Mr. John E. Hazelton, at the office, 83, Finsbury Pavement, E.C.

Christmas is Coming!

By Pastor THOMAS SPURGEON.

IT seemed a far cry to Christmas while the year was young, but it is already upon us. The months have rolled away at a great rate.

"So is Christmas," we used to say, when loiterers said they were coming. The retort is inappropriate now, for, or ever we are aware, "the festive season" will be with us. Yes, it has been "coming" all the time at the self-same rate. As it nears us, the speed seems faster. It reminds us of the express train in the cinematograph, which appears to fly faster as it approaches, till, with a wave of the handkerchiefs of the passengers, it rushes from our sight. Christmas and its festivities will soon be as a dream when one awaketh—a mere memory. We want it to be a pleasant dream—a happy memory. Kind reader, will you not help to make it so?

It has ever been so at the Stockwell Orphanage. Large-hearted friends, who have helped all the year round, have put their hands specially deep into their pockets when the president has whispered "Christmas is coming," and some who have aided at no other time, have said within themselves, "We must respond to this appeal, for Christmas is coming!"

It is hardly possible to help the orphans too often; but furthermore the fatherless have a special claim when the Birthday of the Child Jesus comes in sight.

> His natal hours unnumbered blessings bring,
> Help to the helpless—comfort to distrest,
> Hope to the hopeless—to the weary rest.

Let me put the matter very plainly. We have special need this year. Currants are going up, for one thing. But so are most things, except our general fund. Thank God, we have not suffered so much as some other good works from the opening of extra channels which have drained the benevolent; still it must be confessed that the water has been very shallow sometimes for a ship of such deep draught. We have no fear of running ashore,

BUT WE LIKE THE "BLUE WATER" BEST.

But whatever happens, the dear children must have their extra fun and special food at Christmas time. That goes without saying. But it doesn't go without paying, so let each of my readers, and all whom they can influence, remember that "Christmas is coming" to the Stockwell Orphanage and its fatherless inmates, and forthwith determine to help us, not only to make the brief season bright, but to replenish the funds with a gift that will last when this Christmas is no longer "coming" but "gone."

I wish you could imagine our big family, 500 strong, anticipating the treat of the year! They always look happy, for they are well fed, and cared for, and loved; but I cannot help fancying that about December, despite its dulness and drizzle, they look even happier than usual. It is because even fogs say to them, "Christmas is coming." Now, suppose we let them say to us what the dark November days, and the fallen leaves, and the early twilight, and the occasional frosts say to them! Are you ready for the music of 500 lusty voices crying out in perfect unison—

CHRISTMAS IS COMING!

Encore, boys and girls! A little more loudly this time if you please; for some people, unfortunately, are just a little deaf.

CHRISTMAS IS COMING!!

That's better; but practice makes perfect! Suppose you try again, for it would be such a pity if anybody had to say, "Really, I never thought of it." Let us wake them up! Now, then, all together!

CHRISTMAS—IS—COMING!!!

Distressed Ladies. — The Society for the Assistance of Ladies in Reduced Circumstances continues its useful and beneficent service. Many, were it not for the timely aid of the Society, would lack the common necessaries of life. Various means of helping the Society are provided, fancy work, embroidery, music copying, and typewriting being undertaken, particulars of which will be gladly forwarded by the hon. secretary, Miss E. M. Smallwood, The Lees, Great Malvern.

Children of Sorrow.

ONE of the saddest features of our social life is the ill-treatment to which children are subjected at the hands of inhuman parents. Those who are unacquainted with the facts would scarcely credit the condition to which the unhappy little ones are reduced—bruised, battered, and starved, until life is an almost insupportable burden.

Fortunately, many of them are rescued by the law. They have strong friends in some very useful philanthropic societies, and the police court missionaries are their stalwart champions. Here is a typical case, in which of twelve years is rescued from a ferocious father and stepmother, who are sent to prison. Amid the scarcely-suppressed applause of the Court, the fragile, half-crushed human blossom is given into the kind keeping of loving and sympathetic Christian workers. In a word, she is handed over to Miss Steer, of the Bridge of Hope.

Many years have passed since Miss Steer began her great crusade in behalf of the children of the slums. Steadily the work has grown, until, in addition to the important institutions at Betts Street, in the very heart of metropolitan misery; there are no fewer than eight Cottage Homes at Chingford, close to the most glorious part of Epping Forest, and in the midst of a fine open country.

Each Home has its "Mother," each is a bright and cosy retreat from the squalor and misery of London life, and here, under Christian influences, the dark past is gradually forgotten, and Miss Steer's tender charges develop into neat and modest young women. It is a liberal education to glance through at the Bridge of Hope from those who have gone out to service, or have, in some instances, engaged in the Lord's work. Here is a lady who always comes to Miss Steer for her servants. Her verdict—quite an unsought one—is, that she has had four maids in ten years, and has parted with each one with many regrets.

All the children that are received are not ill-treated by parents; nevertheless, as the result of neglect, or for want of proper guardianship, some have been subjected to almost unmentionable wrongs. Almost all, too, have been left to run the streets, and have become, even in tender years, the associates of bad companions. Some, again, are brought by broken-hearted fathers, who implore Miss Steer to take them, to prevent them descending, through the hard-heartedness of drunken mothers, into the abyss of metropolitan vice.

Marvellous, indeed, is the transformation one sees at Chingford. Even the "child who never smiled"—because she lived in perpetual fear—becomes a bright prattling little school girl. If a child needs a "sea-side holiday," she always has it; as for a "fresh-air" fund, Miss Steer's is a notable one indeed, for her large and ever-increasing family of charges have fresh-air all the year round.

Never was this well-known work in the best sense in so prosperous a condition; never were the workers more happily united in their labours of love; never were there so of doing good so devotedly utilized. This truly national work is, however, sadly needing the measure of financial support which it so emphatically deserves.

The winter is upon us; there are no funds in hand. In addition to the heavy burden of the Cottage Homes, there are the children's breakfasts for puny, ill-fed, little mortals who have to go breakfastless to school in the huge, dingy, East End of London. Then there is the Night Shelter for Homeless Young Women and Girls, with free meals and Christian care. But for the Shelter, to what unthinkable end would, in all probability, some of these destitute and forlorn sisters of ours drift? When we add to all this the thought of the great Rescue Homes which Miss Steer has conducted at Betts Street with such profit to the community, surely we have before us operations of an important character. All are carried on in a spirit of fervent devotion to the Master, and assuredly demand our prayerful sympathy and earnest support. Communications should be sent to Miss Steer, the Bridge of Hope, Betts Street, St. George's East, E.

Friendless and Fallen.

THE painful struggle entailed in the unhappy war and the impending signs of returning peace, hailed with joyful satisfaction by every Christian, remind us that the continuous struggle between sin and suffering, righteousness and evil, still goes on, and claims the unceasing efforts of the Lord's people to proclaim his truth, and to sustain every effort for the salvation—soul and body—of the sinful and suffering in the world.

Readers of The Christian cannot fail to be interested in the work of woman's rescue and reclamation, in which the London Female Preventive and Reformatory Institution is engaged, and for which, we are sorry to learn, funds are now urgently needed.

Facts like the following do, indeed, speak eloquently, and are calculated to impress their painfulness and urgency on the hearts of our readers, as we are informed they have already done on the Committee of the Homes.

IMPORTUNATE APPLICATION

was made on behalf a young girl, but fourteen years of age, whose history, well authenticated, discloses the following shocking circumstances: She is one of a family of five, born in a well-known English seaport. Both her parents are grossly immoral. Her three sisters have all lived a life of shame. The ruin of one of them was first effected before she was sixteen years of age, by her own father, of which (shocking to say) he makes no secret. The unhappy girl, who died a painful death shortly after, was confined in the same small house, where her own mother, within a fortnight, also gave birth to an infant. These are now staying with the eldest daughter, who is likewise living in sin. The only brother is the same, having brought his paramour, shamelessly, home to his mother's dwelling-place. The one girl, aged fourteen, for whom admission was sought, alone remained uncorrupted. If rejected, what chance could she have of salvation? By the mercy of God, she was rescued, and is now doing well in the Preventive Home!

Another instance, differing in kind, but equally urgent, is told in the applicant's own words:—

"Dear Miss,—I do ask you to help me! . . . I am staying at a registry office. I cannot stay any longer, as I have not money enough to pay for another week. I have to keep myself in food, and I am starving for the want of it. Do help me, for Christ's sake, in some way or other. I do not want to tramp the streets, yet I do not know what I shall do after Friday.

IT WILL LEAD ME TO SUICIDE.

. . . I do not want you to think I have fallen again. I would rather do anything than go to the dogs like that." This poor young woman was cared for, and is now in a respectable situation and doing well!

Judging by the accounts issued by the Committee of the Homes, many other instances equally urgent could be quoted did space permit. The Homes are now in full operation. Want of funds at the time does not necessarily cause the rejection of any suitable applicant. The poor girl is admitted and helped at once, and the committee put their trust in the goodness of God to incline the hearts of his people to provide means for the support of the Homes, and they bear testimony that his goodness has never yet failed them.

From the opening of the Homes, in 1857, nearly 40,000 young women and girls have been assisted to make a new start in life, and annually 800 applications for admission are received. About 2,000 Gospel services are held every year in the Homes by a large staff of voluntary workers. Suitable classification of the inmates is as far as possible maintained, and about 180 young women and girls are maintained in the various departments. The Preventive Home is situated at Parson's Green, Fulham, where one of the Reformatory Homes is also established, and in the heart of London (King's Cross) stands the Open-all-Night Refuge to welcome penitent and friendless young women and girls at any hour of the day or night.

Mr. W. J. Taylor, 200, Euston Road, will be happy to send further particulars to any who may desire them.

Closed Wards.

THERE is a hospital, the Victoria, standing in the midst of one of our richest London districts, sorely in need of help—a hospital which (opened some thirty-three years ago) has done a giant's work among the sick children of Chelsea, Battersea, Lambeth, Fulham, and Westminster, upwards of 31,000 little sufferers having occupied beds in its wards, and upwards of one million having received out-patient relief. It is, however, too small, and wholly insufficient to meet the wants of some 160,000 children now living in the surrounding districts. It has for years past been unequal to the work imposed upon it, and lately, the ever-increasing demand for better sanitation and ventilation have forced the Committee largely to decrease the number of beds.

To meet the requirements of the districts it serves, the number of beds available should be more than doubled. It is impossible to add to the existing building, and a new hospital is imperatively needed, and must be built. But the Committee have not yet received sufficient promises of support to justify the step.

CLOSED WARDS! WHAT DOES IT MEAN?

No funds coming in and grave faces in the Board Room; a wise Committee cuts its coat according to its cloth, and many children must in consequence go unhelped.

It means that many little ones must lose the chances of health which were almost within reach. "I have ever so many cases waiting for beds," pleads the doctor, but it cannot be avoided; heavy discouragement among the staff, with rows of empty cots.

It means silent wards, which but yesterday were full of children's gentle chatter, and bright with flowers and dainty figures. It means a great machine lying idle for want of fuel, unable to work on account of unsuitable environment. We feel like Helen's Babies, and we long for the good that might have been done in those long empty wards, where all all is silence—and oh; the pity of it!

"It is so nice to take flowers and toys to a children's ward to see the little things sit up and smile, to see wee Polly's face brighten and Jem's eager appreciation—so nice!" says my lady, and as she goes home, she thinks how fortunate these children are—her own could not have been more beautifully cared for; but next week that ward will close—does she know? And the children will go home—such homes! Does she realize? Dark stairs, such as her dainty feet never trod! Such rooms as she never saw! One bed for all the family—working-man and cripple child! No comfort no ventilation, nothing that sickness requires! These things must be seen to be understood. Baby does without the care that "do set him up that beautiful," and little Polly fades through the long hot summer days in her slum home, and gets thinner and frailer, and her eyes larger and more pathetic, as she nears the Land of the Blessed; while Jem, discarding all splints and bandages, and the many injunctions of Sister, tumbles about on his bad leg, a cripple for all his years—an instance of "Life's Handicap," through lack of what might have been! Let all who love children lay this matter to heart. Those who desire to help are invited to communicate with the Secretary, Victoria Hospital for Children, Queen's Road, Chelsea, S.W. M.F.E.H.

Horrible Pits and Miry Clay.

By JOHN GRITTON, D.D., Honorary Secretary, Christian Community.

THE work of the Christian Community is an earnest and sustained effort to gather into the Kingdom of God "the good and the bad," the halt, lame, blind, and all those who are very urgently in need of instruction and assistance. The streets and lanes and highways are our field of service. We are visitants of many a horrible pit of human woe and depravity, and often have to lay hold of men and women who slip downwards, and not seldom sink in the miry clay.

The work is great, and the labourers are many, but many more labourers are needed, that the work may both grow and be better done.

In 1899-1900, 450 voluntary workers were in the field. The field embraces twenty-three workhouses, infirmaries, and casual wards, seven mission halls, many lodging houses of different grades—mostly of the lowest—in Spitalfields, Poplar, the Borough, Notting Hill, Bethnal Green, &c.; and twenty open-air preaching stations.

At each centre are found many agencies in operation, adapted to the terrible physical and moral need of the ones with whom we have to deal—Bible-readings, prayer-meetings, individual converse, lectures, musical exercises, sewing-classes, Sunday and night schools, a night's rest on forms in a warm hall for those who cannot find a few pence for lodging, or are too late for admission to casual wards. In addition, there are free Sunday breakfasts and suppers of tea and cocoa, free meals for children, and Bands of Hope and of Mercy. Earnest efforts are made to employ aged widows and spinsters, without pauperizing them. Tracts and periodicals in large numbers are circulated. Admission for the sick is found to hospitals, infirmaries, refuges. Fallen women and girls are sought and rescued, and many preventive measures are enterprised. Work is found for those who desire to amend their ways, and for others who, without fault, find themselves in the great army of the unemployed. So long as by capitalists, and fostered by Government for purposes of revenue; so long as men and women in their lust, and the miserable—in their discomfort and despair—find maddening poisons within their reach at every corner, we may labour on, and still find the flood of woe and sin augmenting, and flowing forward with more destructive powers. One badly conducted drink shop can work more ruin than a dozen mission halls can counteract, and every mere public house means woe and ruin to many souls.

We learn in our fields of operation to cry out against the complicity of churches, Christians, and corporations, in this evil of the drink traffic. We feel that our labours are handicapped and hindered, and our toil made fruitless. We are perplexed at the blindness of legislators, magistrates, and capitalists. May God arrest this curse to humanity!

In addition to direct evangelistic and missionary work, the Christian Community seeks to give something of relief and amusement to great numbers whose lives are sordid, squalid, monotonous, and comfortless. Winter treats and entertainments are provided in infirmaries and workhouses, in mission halls and lodging-houses. In the summer, several thousands of adults and children are taken for a day's outing to Epping Forest. At our Children's Holiday Home at High Beech, Essex, 500 children have enjoyed one week's change to good air, regular food, and kind ministry, while, in many cases, the week has been doubled.

Founded by the Huguenots on their coming to England at the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes, whence is explained our title, Communaute Chretienne, it was resuscitated in 1772, and has been carried on till now, so that the current annual report is numbered 128.

The treasurer is F. A. Bevan, Esq., 54, Lombard Street, E.C., and the Secretary, Mr. J. Atkinson, Memorial Hall, Bethnal Green, London, E.

Liverpool Sheltering Home.

A Retrospect.—Nov. 1872-Nov. 1900.

IT is just twenty-eight years since Mrs. Birt came to Liverpool to open a rescue home and emigration work for the neglected and perishing children of the great seaport, on the invitation of certain merchants who united in a committee to support her efforts. One of these gentlemen offered the loan of some empty premises he had, others promised subscriptions, ladies undertook to make outfits, and the work began and grew.

Over 5,000 children have found shelter and help in these twenty-eight years, and 4,000 of them have been settled in Canada. Many of the cases dealt with in those early years stand out vividly in the memory, and it is most encouraging to trace in the records how these once destitute friendless boys and girls stand to-day. In that first year's work in Liverpool who were without a friend or relative in the world. They seemed to cling all the closer to one another, and were placed near each other in Nova Scotia. The elder, by his own earnings won an education, placed himself at Mr. D. L. Moody's College at Northfield, Mass., and is now a respected and active minister of the Gospel. He wrote: "The verse Mrs. Birt taught us in a lesson under the life-boat on deck, remained in my mind. Though I did not understand it for some time, I prayed it as she told us to do, and at last I was enlightened by God's Holy Spirit, and that verse led me to Christ." The brother is also a Christian and Sunday-school teacher, and both are married to good wives.

TWO BROTHERS WERE ADMITTED

A photograph of a sweet-looking young woman in nurse's costume recalls the memory of the cold winter night when little Mary was first received into the Home. Her mother gained a wretched living by singing about the streets of Liverpool and neighbouring towns. Mary was born in a workhouse, and from four-r teen days old had been dragged about by he mother often sleeping under the hedges.

The mother placed the sadly emaciated starveling in the hands of Mrs. Birt, and the little thing, when washed and nicely dressed and nourished, and trained into clean ways, became a pretty, gentle young person, who entirely won the hearts of a good merchant and his wife in Canada. They have carefully educated her, and now Mary is a trained nurse, ministering to the sick and dying.

It costs £15 to train, outfit, and place one child in Canada. The sum of £10 covers passage and outfit alone. Will friends help this winter to add to the number thus rescued and lifted up in life? They will "shine some day as stars in your crown of rejoicing."

"Whosoever shall give . . . to one of these little ones . . . verily he shall in no wise lose his reward." The Sheltering Home is in Myrtle Street, Liverpool.

George Yard, Whitechapel.

THE George Yard Mission has been for many years carrying on its beneficent work in the East End. It is the outcome of one of the earliest efforts to reach and improve the conditions of the masses of the people; and long before the days of the School Board a large Ragged-School was carried on here. Many a poor homeless waif has been fed, clothed, and sheltered, and the fatherless and widows have been visited and helped in their affliction.

This year the Mission mourns the loss of its venerated superintendent, the late Mr. George Holland, whose genial presence, kindly help, and ready sympathy will be missed by many. He was a man who was loved by all who knew him, and by his personality. The world is indeed poorer by his loss. But if God takes his workers, He carries on his work, and so we find that under the direction of the Committee, who have for many years been associated with Mr. Holland, the various agencies for the spiritual, moral, and physical well-being of the poor are being actively carried on.

The Committee are looking for great blessing on the work, and arranging for special services to be held early in the new year to seek for an outpouring of God's Holy Spirit. The invitation has been issued by Lord Northampton, the President, who invites all who loved the late Mr. George Holland, to unite with them in constant and believing prayer for great blessing on the work.

CYCLE OF PRAYER.

Sunday.—For the Sunday Schools, Bible Classes, morning and evening services, and Jewish Meetings.

Monday.—For the Day School, Band of Hope and Temperance Meetings, Lads' Club, and Girls' Classes.

Tuesday. — For the Training Home for Servants, Mothers' Meetings, Boys' Sewing Classes, and Prayer Meeting.

Wednesday.—For the Crèche, Good Influence Club, the Y.W.C.A. Branch and Entertainments, the Young Men.

Thursday.—For the Shelter, the Mission to Inebriates, the Sewing Classes, Lads' Bible Class.

Friday.—For Holiday Homes, Men's and Women's Bible Classes, and Young Women's Christian Band.

Saturday.—For all Workers, Young Women's Bible Class, for needed provision of funds, for more voluntary workers.

George Yard has many splendid traditions, one of which is the great importance of looking after the children. The babies are taken at a few weeks old into the Crèche, and are looked after all day for a small payment whilst the mothers are at work. Then there are large day and Sunday schools; classes for lads and girls, besides the more direct evangelistic services, Bible classes, and meetings. The headquarters of the work are at 87, High Street, Whitechapel.

"New Cut" Diamonds.

THE remarkable work which has been gradually built up in the notorious "New Cut" district of South-East London, under the name of the Working Men's Mission, is an object-lesson of what may be accomplished even in the lowest parts of our great cities by the faith and devotion of plain, unassuming men of the working class.

Twenty-three years have elapsed since the work was initiated by the Brothers Young, and it continues to under their guidance. Mr. T. G. Young, of burly physique and a go-ahead character, is one of the best known and best loved men in the district, while Mr. J. B. Young's kindness and geniality are no less useful in attracting and influencing the rough diamonds of the New Cut.

The Mission Hall, situate in Collingwood Street, is a centre of religious and philanthropic activities. The people love it for its homeliness. The problem of "reaching the masses," which in some places seems so difficult of solution, appears to be non-existent in Collingwood Street. Yet the neighbourhood is one that would strike the average onlooker as replete with difficulties. The flaring gin palaces, gay with light and colour, and upholstered in the latest fashion, are crammed with people; many of the slums are constituted of dingy little dwellings, in which some of the single rooms contain a family, and which would be difficult to match, for squalid conditions, in any part of the misery-ridden metropolis.

During the past year, the work has developed in many directions, and the pithy accounts of spiritual meetings or social relief work which are given by the Brothers Young in their annual report are of an encouraging nature.

The testimonies to conversion occupy, as usual, an important place, for our friends at Collingwood Street never forget that their great aim is to LEAD SINNERS TO THE SAVIOUR.

The reputation of Messrs. Young and their associates as hot Gospellers serves, no doubt, to attract to the hall those who are under conviction of sin. Many, too, casually visit the hall, who would scarcely think of entering a church or chapel. Here is a word from one who thus came under influences which helped him to immediate decision: "It may be interesting to you and helpful to others to know how such a deep-dyed sinner was brought to Christ. For many Sundays I was in the habit of coming to John Street to an old friend, and, if the public-houses were not open, we used to pass our time by stopping at the corner of Marlborough Street and listening to the friends of the Collingwood Street Working Men's Mission. It happened one Sunday my friend was rather longer than usual coming down. I was standing by the railings on the left, and I took more interest in the speaking and singing.

"After a very earnest appeal from Mr. Jim Young a hymn was sung. The last verse, if I may use the phrase, 'caught on':—

> "I change, He changes not,
> The Christ can never die:
> His love, not mine, the resting place,
> His truth, not mine, the tie.

"I listened to the invitation to come to the Mission at night. I did not stop for my friend or the beer. I went straight home. My mind was not easy. So at night I found myself in the Mission, and it was there that Jesus Christ revealed Himself to me. I rejoice to tell you that I have had a joy that was not known to me before. And to-day I bless and praise God for the gift of Jesus Christ, and of his precious promise that He not only saves but keeps."

This case is typical of many, as a visit to the New Cut will readily demonstrate, for in the open air a large band of converts are ever ready to testify to the saving power of God.

The Mission has so extended that branches are carried on in York Street, Walworth, and Decima Street, Bermondsey.

EVANGELISTIC AND TEMPERANCE MEETINGS are regularly held, and in spite of occasional difficulties a good work has been done. Among children, as well as adults, there is a sustained and prayerful effort to impress hearers with the duty and privilege of immediate decision, and many have been gathered in; of late some of the elder lads and girls have come out on the Lord's side.

With the coming of winter, increased responsibilities fall upon the devoted superintendents. Many of the sick and aged poor look to them for needed assistance in order to "keep the wolf from the door," and large numbers of puny, ill-fed, school children must be supplied with free meals. It is estimated that no fewer than 100,000 soup dinners are provided in the course of a winter's season at Collingwood Street.

Messrs. Young entertain the hope that, ere long, they may be enabled to secure and erect commodious and suitable premises. A sum of £1,000 has been offered on condition that a freehold site is secured, and that a new building is erected and opened free of debt within six years. Those who feel impressed to take part in this beneficent enterprise may address Messrs. Young, at 33, Nelson Square, Blackfriars Road, S.E.

Billingsgate Christian Mission.—A work among so vast a congregation of men as are engaged at the Billingsgate Markets is not without peculiar difficulties. It is evident, however, that there is no tendency to become despondent on the part of those engaged in any departments of the Christian Mission, for the annual report bears testimony to the persistent and energetic effort which has marked the year. The medical branch has proved a boon and blessing to many. Ministering to the physical needs of those employed in the markets and wharves affords an opportunity of getting into personal contact with them, and bringing the Gospel to their hearts. At the east and west of the market, in Lower Thames Street, are stationed the coffee stalls, bearing Scripture texts, reminding customers that there is a bread other than that which perishes. By these and other means the frequenters of Billingsgate are brought under the influence of the Gospel, and the fact that some fifty salesmen in the markets subscribe to the Mission is a tribute of confidence and approval. The secretary is Mr. A. Walters, 19, St. Mary-at-Hill, Lower Thames Street, E.C.

The Royal National Mission to Deep Sea Fishermen.

AMONGST the more modern of our great missionary societies, this society for the benefit and uplifting of fishermen takes a foremost place, both on account of the diversity of its work, and the large class of men to whom it reaches forth a helping hand.

The life of a deep sea fisherman is a hard one at the best, and until the year 1881, practically nothing was being done for the spiritual, moral, or physical well-being of that great class of men whose lives are practically spent upon the sea, which is almost home to them.

While, through ignorance, the Church of Christ was idle, the emissaries of evil were doing untold harm amongst our great trawling fleets. Vessels, largely from Dutch ports, called "copers," sold fiery brandy, known to the fishermen as "chain lightning," vile literature, and other abominations, bringing not alone misery to the men and their families at home who looked to them for support, but too often disasters, sometimes accompanied by appalling loss of life (whole vessels being lost with every man on board), resulted from the drunken orgies that took place from time to time far out at sea.

Now all this is changed. One grand result largely brought about through the unceasing work of this truly Royal and National Society, has been the signing of the North Sea Convention, making it illegal under any circumstances to supply drink to the fishermen at sea.

There is now in every fleet a vessel that is a church, hospital, and floating club in one. Accidents figure largely in such dangerous work as trawling, and so it speedily came to pass that the mission was to be known as existing "as well for the body as the soul;" and on the bows of the mission vessels appeared, in golden letters, the words, "Preach the Word!" "Heal the Sick!"

In 1892 a most important extension of the work took place, and the Society that was formed "in humble dependence upon Almighty God, to carry the blessings of the Gospel to the fishermen on the North Sea and elsewhere," lengthened its cords and strengthened its stakes in going to the cod fishermen of Northern Newfoundland and Labrador. There is now a very large and increasingly important amongst these people, who, until the advent of the Society amongst them, had no medical assistance. The fishing fleets at home are waited upon by the "Bethel" ships that follow them wherever they go, and befriend them at every turn, in summer, in winter, in storm and calm. Ashore their needs are ministered to in the fishermen's houses and institutes that have been opened at Aberdeen (on board a hulk), North Shields, Grimsby (the largest fishing port in the world), Gorleston, Milford Haven, and Ymuiden in Holland. The secretary is Mr. Francis H. Wood, 181, Queen Victoria Street, E.C.

Jews of East London.—Mr. Henry Barnett is a quiet worker among the Jews of East London, his centre of operations being the Gospel Hall, 70, Sidney Street, Commercial Road. In a recently-issued syllabus we read: "The hall is one where saints have gathered to the name of the Lord, for breaking of bread and worship, for the last fifty years. In 1892, the assembly was led in God's providence to take up Gospel work among the Jews in the neighbourhood. It evangelizes the Jews by means of open-air Gospel testimony, and the ones and the twos that are drawn with other people now and then into the hall by that means. It has also a fair Sunday school, to which all classes of children are welcomed, Bible readings and prayer meetings. It also circulates the Scriptures and sound tracts, by which means it often reaches the Jews in the provinces and abroad. It visits also the people in their homes." Fruit of "The Stricken Field."

Liberator Relief Fund.

By Rev. STOCKWELL WATTS.

WITH profound joy and devout gratitude we have been able to report that our heart's desire, formed eight years since, has at last become an accomplished fact, the Liberator Relief Fund having reached the original estimate of £100,000, and the aged and destitute victims of the cruellest fraud in the 19th Century, who were among the first recipients of the Fund, have now the satisfaction of knowing that their grants, partial substitutes for their lost dividends, will be continued to them as long as they live and are in need of the same.

During this trying and tragic year, the noble generosity of our subscribers has yielded upwards of £9,000, mainly in response to the appeal, entitled "Beleaguered on British Soil." Surely this is a fruit of "The Stricken Field" of a very cheering character.

Since the above estimate was made, the Committee have felt compelled to take on nearly 400 very needy cases, of the which no fewer than 100 have been dealt with during the past year. Many of these are over seventy years of age—the great majority are over sixty, the others confirmed invalids, and to make anything like adequate provision for them, at least another

£10,000 MUST BE SPEEDILY RAISED.

We have now scheduled in all 3,014 cases, all of which have been duly accredited by two responsible local references as being in a destitute or semi-destitute condition through the failure of the Balfour Group of Companies: 1,548 are widows or spinsters; 1,486 are over sixty years of age; 824 are over seventy years of age; 233 are over eighty years of age; and there have been 487 deaths, many of them undoubtedly hastened by the shock of the disaster.

TYPICAL CASES.

A messenger (age 50), Congregationalist, who lost £400. His wife wrote in August:—"My dear husband is now, through the loss of our money, in the County Asylum, and I am left with two young children and myself to support. I have tried to let my rooms, but this has been a failure, and I am in great difficulties, not having been able to pay my rates, and fearing every day I shall be summoned. Can you, dear sir, help one of God's suffering children? If I only had the £400, which my husband put into the 'Liberator,' I should not have to ask you. If only a trifle, it would be most acceptable in this my time of need."

An aged dressmaker (64), Baptist, who lost £350, writes Sept., 1900:—"Fourteen years ago I was obliged to give up business owing to a serious illness, which left me at the end of twelve months very deaf and very feeble, with nothing but the above small investment, and a very little that I managed to earn at needlework. Since then I have lived with a widowed sister, who lost in the same concern over £900. She is in her 75th year, and is now living on a small life annuity, which she has kindly shared with me. Finding that I cannot work as I have done, I shall be very thankful for a little help. I have been unwilling to ask as long as I could do without it."

An aged labourer (84), Church of England, who lost all his hard-earned savings, £200, but has not applied to the Relief Fund before, because he had a few pounds left in the Savings Bank, and was able to earn a little during the summer months. He is now, however, in daily dread that, after all his efforts to be independent, he will have to seek parish relief.

His clergyman writes, November, 1900:—"The poor old man will be eighty-five years of age next February. Now that he has spent nearly every penny that he possessed, he feels very loth indeed to become a burden to the parish. You doubtless know well that it is the highest ambition of nearly all men who have led a consistent and saving life to die without being obliged to seek parish relief. He is one of that class, and I write to ask if you can do anything to render the few latter days of this good and worthy old man tolerable and peaceful."

A seamstress (aged 50) Wesleyan, who lost nearly £2,000, writes November, 1900:—"All my money being invested in 'The Liberator Building Society,' 'House and Land Investment Trust,' and 'London and General Bank,' when these companies failed I lost about £2,000—the interest on these investments being all my income. At the time of the failure, I had an invalid mother, eighty-three years of age, dependent on me. By taking in lodgers and doing sewing, I was enabled to keep her in comfort as long as she lived. I nursed her for eight years alone, and being partly mental trouble, the continued strain on my nerves has completely shattered my own health. I am entirely dependent upon my own earnings, which owing to ill-health are very precarious. I have been very reluctant to apply to you, knowing how many sad cases there are. I have tried my best, but my nervous system is so shattered, I feel very unable for constant work." Her reference—a Wesleyan pastor, adds:—"Miss —— is extremely

CONSCIENTIOUS, ALMOST TO A FAULT.

She has hoped to save your funds for others worse off than herself, and has toiled hard, but at last is compelled to ask relief. I am afraid of the total ruin of her health."

The gifted pen of the historian will doubtless describe with more or less fulness the fruit of "the stricken field"—martial, social, and political. But some of the most precious facts, with regard to individual persons, will never be recorded in this world—the patient endurance, the uncomplaining fortitude, the determined loyalty to duty, and the heroic self-sacrifice.

The bitter conflict of the "Liberator" victims, the Beleaguered on British Soil—their dire struggle to keep the wolf from the door of happy homes that had been built up by life-long industry, thrift, and piety—began eight long years since, and some of the most distressing cases we have lately had to deal with had received till then no help from the Relief Fund. Indeed, curious to relate, they had never heard of the fund until we discovered them in their abject want and misery. They only knew that their very virtues had seemed to snare them into the greatest sorrow of their life.

By the merest accident we were led to visit a poor school-mistress, fifty-five years of age, only four or five months since. We found her dying of and yet, with her arm in a sling and scarcely able to walk, she was bravely struggling to carry on her school when the money she lost in the "Liberator" would have kept her in comparative comfort. Twice she had spent her summer vacation in the public hospital, undergoing operations, and coming out just in time to start afresh her daily task.

We were brought on the scene only because the doctor had now informed her that no further operation would be of any avail, and that she must give up her fast-dwindling school. This she did, only however a short time before her decease. It was our satisfaction to know that a few pounds and a little friendly Christian sympathy brightened the last hours of this splendid heroine.

Yes, and our greatest joy has ever been that through the ministration of this fund the living Christ has come to many an aching heart, and made it hope afresh in a supply that will never fail—"the living bread" which has heavenly treasures that shall never be taken away by malicious foe or misguided friend.

And this joy shall every one of our generous readers share, in loving response to Him who said, "Inasmuch as ye did it unto one of the least of these, ye did it unto Me."

Cheques and P.O.'s should be made payable to the "Liberator" Relief Fund, crossed "The London City and Midland Bank," and sent to the secretary, Visiting in East London.

MAY I beg your kind assistance in making known a great need to your numerous readers? For several years I have been working in a very poor East London parish, containing 11,000 inhabitants, none of the upper class, and the greater part in extreme poverty.

I am not asking for money, though this is often sorely needed; but for the interest and sympathy which cannot be felt without personal acquaintance with these poor people.

Living nearly twenty miles from East London, my visiting is, of course, done at considerable disadvantage; but if some of your readers who live nearer would become regular or occasional visitors, they would find the work most interesting—they would be warmly welcomed by the clergy of the parish, and by the poor people, who are not, as a rule, inclined to beg, but who bear most patiently their trials and privations, and heartily appreciate efforts made to cheer and comfort them.

It is a real pleasure to find work for a man who has long sought it in vain; or to give some hard-worked and over-wrought mother a little change into the country, where she can rest and enjoy herself for a short time. Letters for hospitals and convalescent homes are most valuable; and a small invalid kitchen, established through the kindness of friends, has proved of great benefit to the sick.

I will gladly give any information or assistance in my power to those who are disposed to take up the work.—Yours faithfully,

(Mrs.) Constance Taylor.
The Larches, Banstead, Surrey.

South London Christian Union. — The annual meeting of this useful organization was held last week in Peckham Rye Tabernacle. Mr. Alfred Holness, president of the Union, occupied the chair, and addresses were given by Revs. John Tuckwell, J. Farren, H. J. Knight, Messrs. Goddard, Clark, and Ned Wright. The annual report told of much good work done in various parts of South London. Missions have been held, and hospitals and infirmaries visited. The financial position shows an adverse balance of £14.

Westminster Lodging-House Mission.—This Mission has been carrying on a useful, though unobtrusive, work in Westminster for the last eleven years. The summary report and balance-sheet recently printed shows that thirty-nine girls have been rescued and placed in Homes during the last year, by far the largest number recorded in any one year since the formation of the Mission in 1889, which is the cause of great thankfulness to Him who deigns to use his servants. Copies of the report and balance-sheet will be gladly sent to all who desire it on application to the hon. secretary, Mr. J. H. Lloyd, 13, Sutherland Place, Ebury Bridge, S.W.

The Grotto Home for Working Boys, which is situate at 35, Paddington Street, W., was reopened a few days ago, after extensive alterations. Sir J. H. Kennaway presided at the ceremony. The hon. secretary, Colonel Clarke, passed in review the history and work of the Home since its inauguration in 1846. Its primary object was to give elder lads on the verge of crime or ruin one more chance in life; but during the last few years it has been found necessary to open the Home to working boys, especially for those who have been trained in industrial schools, for whom there was no certified home in London. The Grotto has accordingly been renovated and altered for the reception of forty boys. The general improvement and accommodation of the institution was commented upon by the chairman, and Mr. J. G. Legge, H.M. Inspector, expressed his admiration of the way in which the alterations to the Home had been carried out.

Clerkenwell Poor.—There are many indications of the progress of the Lamb and Flag Ragged Schools and Mission, Clerkenwell. Among the tenants of slums, courts, and alleys, this extensive and much-needed work, which is affiliated with the Ragged School Union, has been carried on for fifty-seven years. One encouraging feature of the work has been the number of conversions, followed by others in their family. Often has it occurred that husband and wife, mother and son, have been led to yield themselves to Christ. The Bible schools are held on Sunday morning, afternoon, and evening. Nearly all the teachers were once scholars in the school. The Bible classes for young men and women, and among the children, the Band of Hope and cripple work, have been maintained with many tokens of blessing. The hon. secretary, Mr. S. B. Giffen, Moulinere House, Putney Bridge Road, S.W., will be pleased to forward copies of the annual report.

The Protestant Alliance.

SINCE the time of the Papal aggression in 1850, Popery, under various names and in many subtle ways, has achieved an unexpected advance throughout the British Isles. It has tainted our schools; its representatives have crept into our gaols and workhouses, and have literally permeated the Established Church with their pernicious dogmas. Jesuitical priests, aided by swarms of Sisters dressed in nunnery garb, appear to compass sea and land to make proselytes. Thus the unlearned, unstable, and unwary increase the influence and the wealth of the Italian Mission in this country.

There can be no doubt that the general indifference or ignorance of Protestants, and a neglect to instruct the young in the main points of difference between Protestantism and Popery, have made the Papal invasion easier. The late Lord Shaftesbury (the seventh Earl) saw the need of an undenominational society to check the aggressions of the Papacy, and he founded the Protestant Alliance in 1851, in order to combine all classes of Protestants of the Empire, not only to oppose the Papal aggression of the Bishop of Rome as a violation of national independence, but to maintain and defend, against all the Scriptural doctrines of the Reformation, and the principles of civil and religious liberty, as the best security, under God, for the temporal and spiritual welfare and prosperity of the United Kingdom.

An organization such as the Alliance, which has been working steadily and successfully for nearly fifty years, hardly needs an extended examination of its principles; but it is well that it should be known as widely as possible what is the constitution of the Society, what are its objects, and what is its religious basis. The objects have already been defined; the constitution is of the simplest possible character. It is a body composed of persons of various political opinions, and holding different views on Church matters. The one link which unites them is a firm conviction that the objects in view are of far higher importance than any difference of opinion on politics or Church government. The Alliance has very definite work to perform, and therein it aims to unite the Protestants of the Empire in a firm and persevering demand, both in Parliament and out of it, that the national support and encouragement given to Popery of late years should be discontinued.

The Alliance aims to extend, so far as practicable, the sympathy and support of British Christians to those in foreign countries who may be suffering oppression for the cause of the Gospel; and to call forth the influence of the British Government to obtain for Protestants, when residing in Roman Catholic countries, religious liberty equal to that which is granted to Roman Catholics in Great Britain, especially the liberty of public worship and of burying their dead according to their own rites; and, above all, freedom in the use and circulation of the Word of God. But it must never be lost sight of that the work of the Alliance is a spiritual work, and so we find that it has for its basis

THE FOLLOWING FUNDAMENTAL PRINCIPLES:

(1) The Word of God as a sole, sufficient, and supreme rule of faith, worship, and life; (2) the doctrine of Justification by Faith alone; (3) the doctrine of the one offering of Christ finished upon the cross; and (4) the repudiation of all human pretensions to sacerdotal power and authority in the Church of Christ. This basis is a simple and effective one. It is also very comprehensive. The Alliance is the oldest Protestant society, and for nearly half a century it has succeeded in binding Churchmen and Nonconformists together for the maintenance of the Scriptural principles of the Reformation against Ritualism and Romanism.

In previous years the Alliance was content with a small Monthly Letter, but in January, 1898, a much larger publication was issued, as the Official Organ of the Society. So useful has this publication become, and so widely is it read, that the Committee do not feel called upon to issue a separate report; they appeal rather to the twelve numbers of the official magazine to show what the efforts of the organization have been during the last twelve months.

During the present year the work done by the Protestant Alliance in connection with the involved very heavy expenses, which have impoverished its exchequer; and the Committee are now compelled to appeal for special donations. A specially prepared paper was published for gratuitous circulation during the School Board elections, and at least 50,000 copies were freely circulated! The secretary (Mr. S. W. Brett) is prepared, upon communication, to send open-air speakers, provide lecturers for indoor meetings, give Protestant lantern lectures to children, supply Protestant literature gratis, and conduct missions in Papal and Ritualistic districts. These varied items of work are worthy of special consideration, and ought to receive a large amount of support. The Protestant Alliance promotes the education of the young in sound Protestant principles, thus arming them against the wiles of Papal or Anglican Sacerdotalism; and further, preaching the Gospel in halls and in the open air to those who have been under Roman Catholic influences, in the hope that they will be brought to a saving knowledge of the truth.

The offices of the Alliance are at 430, Strand, W.C.

Sailors' Welcome Home.

MISS CHILD is still at the helm of her God-given work at the Welcome Home. The old Bible chart is still upon the table: the captain, Christ Jesus, is still on board; and though the vessel has been passing through a severe storm in the long illness of the first mate, Mr. Blaauw, she still flies her colours bravely.

The name of this ship is suggestive of her mission, Welcome Home; for here sailors of many nations find a true Christian "home"; indeed, the homeliness of the work is its chief feature, while a "welcome" ever awaits the comer, be he one who has returned again and again, or a man who for the first time appears at the door.

It is emphatically a Christian home, and the number of men who have become Christians and true missionaries through its influence is truly marvellous.

What the haven is to the sailor, that the Welcome Home is in the highest sense. What the pilot is to an incoming vessel, that Christ has been to many a ship signalled from this station. And what the lifeboat has been to hundreds of shipwrecked ones on our coast, that, and more, in spiritual matters has been the service of Christian helpers who here nightly man the lifeboat of salvation. At this season of the year, is the great event—the cargo consisting of woollens and other things useful to sea-going men, their wives and children, sent in by Christian friends all over the kingdom. Each year God has graciously owned the Gospel meetings held in connection with the Boat. The date fixed for this year's unloading is December 22 (D.V.). Will those who intend sending cargo please note this, and forward their gifts in time to Miss Child, Welcome Home, Canning Town, E. WM. LUFF.

UNLOADING THE CHRISTMAS BOAT

☞ Camberwell Lighthouse Mission.—In the streets of Camberwell some seventeen years ago, a small band of workers might have been found night after night, singing and preaching the Gospel. As a result of this unpretentious effort, a large mission hall was secured in George Street. Here the work is still sustained with many encouraging results. The destitute children, cripples, etc., are sought out and visited, and many a ray of sunshine has penetrated dark and desolate homes through the kindly ministry of the workers of the Lighthouse Mission. The hon. superintendent is Mr. R. R. Blewer, 12, Elmington Road, Camberwell, S.E.

At the Front of the Fight.

LONDON, with its teeming population, its vast wealth, and its dire and squalid poverty, has even been a centre of desperate spiritual conflict, and all the resources of sacred ingenuity have been in demand for the purpose of devising plans of campaign, and methods for meeting the ever-varying tactics of the foe. The commenced their career nearly sixty years ago in a region which was at that time one of the headquarters of depravity, violence, and crime. The invasion was stoutly resisted, but the invaders held their ground, and have ever since kept their position at the front of the fight. The institution has undergone large developments, and has long taken a prominent part in reclaiming work amongst the poorest of the London population.

The Refuges for Men and Women have sheltered and relieved many thousands who had sunk into homeless destitution—some whose despair had brought them to the verge of self-destruction—whilst in not a few cases prodigals have become trophies of Divine grace.

The following may be taken as an illustration of the Refuge work:—On a bleak winter night a man and woman rang the Refuge bell and pleaded for admission. Their story was a short and sad one. They were homeless and friendless and starving. They had been obliged to sell their home, and part with everything they possessed. The previous night they had walked the streets. They were admitted, and were found to be respectable Christian people. After a short period of rest, and with a little timely help, they were restored to their original position in life. The Industrial Schools of boys and girls from the perils of the streets, training them as carpenters, bootmakers, bakers, tailors, domestic servants, seamstresses, and laundry-maids. The following case may be mentioned:—Y.Z. was a "doorstep girl," and although only thirteen years of age might have been seen late at night consorting with bad companions in the lowest parts of London. She was placed in this school, and is now a respected officer in the laundry of a public institution, doing well, and giving satisfaction to her employers.

Another case is that of a boy who, when admitted, was a veritable street arab—an expert street beggar, and a constant associate of those who were doing their utmost to train him for a career of crime. In this school, however, he was trained as a bootmaker, and is now the manager of a bootmaking establishment. Several lads have entered the Army and Navy, and it is interesting to know that eleven of them were at the front during and that one of them has received the Distinguished Service Medal for bravery displayed in the attempted rescue of the guns after the battle of Colenso, on December 15, 1899.

It may be said that every department of the Institution has its trophies. Those of the Ragged School are legion; Temperance work can point to its successful results; the Mothers' Meeting (attended by about 400) can tell of transformed homes and changed lives; the Ragged Church, with its large congregation of tramps and other human wrecks, has had many evidences of the Divine approval and blessing—in fact, no branch of the Institution is without its encouragement.

The Committee still desire to keep to the front in this great struggle against the forces which are ever seeking to foster human depravity and vice. In order to maintain their position they need the annual sum of £4,000, in addition to the amount received from the Treasury and the School Board, towards the expenses of the Industrial Schools.

All that is held in the cold, dead hand,
Is what it has given away.

The secretary (from whom copies of the annual report may be had) is Mr. Peregrine Platt, Field Lane Institution, Vine Street, Clerkenwell Road, E.C.

The Children's Home.

FOR thirty-two years Rev. Dr. Bowman Stephenson was identified with this institution. Although now succeeded by Rev. A. E. Gregory as Principal, his interest and heart will be in the good work as long as life lasts, nor will his name ever be forgotten by the thousands of children to whom he has stood in loco parentis. Writing of the work, Dr. Stephenson says:—

Including homes, schools, cripples' mission, and girls' protection work, not less than 1,435 have been under our care. To these must be added a most important branch of work, the systematic visitation and guardianship of about 500 young people, who have left our doors, but yet need, in the years of their adolescence, guiding and guarding influence. If these be added, a total of 1,032 souls have occupied our thoughts and action; and have in varying degree cost us something. Of course, the bulk of the expenditure has been upon those in residence; but the balance has not been less worthily spent.

Who, for instance, will doubt that we ought to spend a reasonable amount in following up and caring for our old boys and girls? When father and mother failed them—through death or poverty, or alas! through vice and indifference—the Lord took them up, and set us to look after them. We have had the mothering of them. But does the mother forget her child, when he goes to work, at fourteen or fifteen years old? Is she heedless of her girl in a situation, at seventeen or eighteen? She may be, because

SHE IS NOT A TRUE MOTHER.

She may be, God forgive her, because folly and vice have eaten the real motherhood out of her. But in proportion as she is a good mother, she will pray for her child, now out in the wide world, will watch over her, will shield and protect, will advise and guide her, until she has passed the dangers which lie around the offsets of life, and has gained not only the strength, but some measure of the good sense which matured years should bring.

So we, mothering the children for Christ, cannot think that we have done with them when the outfit is provided, the box packed, the last prayer offered, and the last hand-shake given. They are ours still; and by patient and ingenious methods we must keep our oversight of them, until they can walk alone in the dangerous paths of this dangerous world.

I also once more plead, that the several missionary efforts which we support are worth the small sums spent upon them, and are entirely germane to our central work. Not only do we maintain public services at several of our branches, but we have a Mission Hall in the East End, a children's mission to the roughest and rudest, a ragged Sunday-school, girls' parlours, and a crippled children's church. The whole cost is an insignificant percentage of our expenditure. But not a penny of this is wasted; its fruits are excellent, and its influence upon our central work is most happy.

The danger of all well-established charitable enterprises is to sink into routine; to become—as the common London phrase has it—a "school," with its invariable routine, its prim formalities, its respectable and conventional religious observances. Such an establishment soon becomes hide-bound: it has no elasticity of method; it demands that all the children received shall precisely comply with its requirements, and turns away unhelped any child who is not precisely so old, or so big, or does not accurately meet its own prescribed standard. The only way to keep clear of this spirit is to keep the whole system

WARM WITH EVANGELICAL FIRE.

The work must be a mission, not an institution. Personal salvation must constantly be the immediate object of the work. The only result with which anybody can be content, must be the heart won for Christ. The shaping of manners, school education, technical instruction, physical training, must all have their proper place; but the golden aim must always be the formation of Christian character. And wherever any body of Christian workers is shut in behind the gates of an institution, working by the clock and the bell, having no breaks upon their routine, no change of enterprise, no outside Christian interests, the whole thing will stiffen and harden into routine.

In a beleaguered town, the best way to keep up the tone and spirit of the garrison is to issue forth in frequent attacks; and where Christian enterprises are entrenched in established institutions, the only way to keep up the spirit of Christian adventure, soldiership, dash, is to make sortie on the vice and ignorance around.

Those who know our work best can tell how wonderfully the tone has been maintained and uplifted since we held our Yearly Convocations, in which we are joined by our Mission Sisters from all parts of the country. And in the like direction these outside enterprises of our work pay us for every penny and every moment spent upon them; by keeping our outlook larger, and our spirit more aggressive, and our faith more direct.

Christian Instruction Society.

THE seventy-fifth annual report of the Christian Instruction Society and Deaconess Mission opens with a hopeful note. As it steadily expands, the work ensures enlarged appreciation. There has been no alteration in the Society's aims and methods. The deaconesses, women of education and leisure, devote their time and energies to work amongst the poor and needy in all parts of the metropolis, going into the homes of the people with the blessed message of pardon and peace.

The report continues:—The following extracts may be taken as typical of the way in which the deaconess is regarded by her superintendent (usually the minister of the church with which she is associated). One such testimony, from South London, runs thus: "I expected much, but have found more than my utmost expectations. . . . Please remember that I claim our Sister for life!" An East End minister says: "Our Sister has indeed done well in all departments—unusually varied—and has proved herself a true, faithful Christian woman and worker." And from a very different district in North London we read: "We had been looking out for a long time for a worker who would give her whole time and thought to visiting in the homes of the people, and in our good Sister we have indeed found just the very help we needed."

This "visiting" continues to be the staple work in all districts, though, in some cases, keeping in touch with the members of a church, and of the various meetings in connection therewith, leaves but little time for opening up fresh ground. Indeed, as a minister put it recently, "One deaconess makes us want two!" Then there are always meetings to be taken, the sick to be cared for, and the destitute to be dealt with; whilst the young, the ignorant, and the dying have their special claims on the care and attention of an all-round worker.

Copies of the report may be had from the Secretary, 35, Memorial Hall, Farringdon Street, E.C.

Dublin Prison Gate Mission.—From the annual report it is obvious that this Mission continues to prove a useful agency for rescuing and reclaiming those who, without food, friends, or shelter are in danger of drifting to ruin. The Mission opens a means of escape from all such dangers to released prisoners, and in this direction many have been removed from the throes of temptation and given a new start in life for honestly earning their own support. The year has been one of definite advance and encouragement. The admissions to the new homes numbered 356, and the average daily attendance 132. The institution has also an industrial side. The laundry affords employment for a daily average of 100, and the sewing class over thirty, besides those who are engaged in the work room. The poor women thus provided two-thirds of the total expenditure of the year by their earnings and dormitory payments. Some sixty women and girls were also placed in suitable situations, and others restored to friends. The treasurer of the Mission is Mr. William Hayes, 12, Grafton Street, Dublin.

Miss Sharman's Home.

IN the thirty-fourth report of the Orphans' Home, Miss Sharman says the pressure of applications for admission this year has been very great, and many sad cases have come under notice. The hardest part of the work is the having to refuse so many whom it would be a privilege to help.

One little family received into the Home last February may be mentioned as typical. The father, a respectable working man, died in January, 1897, of consumption, leaving a widow and three little girls, the youngest only a few months old. The poor mother struggled bravely on, working as a charwoman to support her children and keep a little home together for them.

For some time before her death she suffered with what proved by post-mortem examination to be a tumour on the brain, causing her to be almost blind, so that she had to be led to her work. Friends and neighbours urged her to have medical advice, but she persistently refused, fearing that she might be ordered into the infirmary and separated from her children. She worked on to the very end, which came at last quite suddenly, and then the three little maidens were left orphaned indeed, with no resource but the workhouse, to which they must have been taken immediately after the poor mother's funeral if the doors of the Home had not been opened.

This was one of the cases in which it is so desirable to keep the children of a family together. It seems too terrible for little ones like these, after losing father, mother, and home, to be separated and scattered, perhaps never to meet again during the years of childhood. Surely He who has so tenderly planned the family life will approve of any effort to keep up the family love, and to prevent the severing of such sweet and sacred ties.

Eight times during the past year two little sisters have entered the Home together. Twice three and once four of the same family were admitted. "We close the year with rather more than the full number; and on May 6, 1900 (when the financial year ended), we had 325 olive plants around our table."

Of those who left during the year sixteen were returned to their relatives on account of the mother's remarriage, or of the improved circumstances of the family. Two children were apprenticed to business; two were transferred to other institutions; three little ones were adopted; and twenty-five girls were sent to service.

The Home is in Austral Street, West Square, S.E.

Southwark Factory Girls.—Southwark is a district of the metropolis teeming with factories of every imaginable kind. Such articles as sweets, cigarettes, mineral waters, preserves, stationery, boots and shoes, hats, collars, and innumerable other things are made there. Among the thousands of hands employed in these industries a very large proportion are girls. Their work is generally of a monotonous character, and when they leave it, the homes to which they go are of a wretched description. Less than a year ago the St. Paul's Church Club (affiliated to the Factory Helpers' Union) was opened for these girls. Since that time the membership has steadily increased, and is still increasing, but unfortunately the staff of helpers has not made an equal advance, and workers are urgently needed. Ladies who can give their services should address Miss Elliott, 32a, Earl Street, London Road, S.E.

Chelsea Preventive and Rescue Homes.—The fourteenth annual report of these Homes is a record of a worthy cause, pursued with many tokens of encouragement. With untiring energy Miss Hugill discharges the duties of superintendent, not only in dealing with cases in the Homes, but following with anxiety and interest those who have been assisted and have left the institution. Poor destitute girls have thus been sheltered and cared for, and in times of need have learnt of a Saviour's love while feeling the touch of human sympathy. A number of babies also have been cared for and placed in suitable homes to be nursed, adding much to the responsibility of those who are maintaining the work. It is hoped that circumstances will shortly permit the acquiring of additional premises for the Rescue Home, which are much needed. The secretary is Mrs. S. E. Moorcroft, 93, King's Road, Chelsea, S.W.

Homes for Working Boys

THESE invaluable institutions have an honourable record extending over thirty years. They are not reformatories or industrial schools, where the inmates are kept for the education or manual training; nor are they intended for incorrigible or unmanageable boys. The lads who are admitted must be in situations, or able and willing to work if situations are found for them.

"As to the age of boys on admission," says the secretary, "on the one hand we have such diminutive applicants, about fourteen or fifteen years of age, that we have been compelled to have birth certificates or certificates exempting them from attendance at school before attempting to place them in situations. On the other hand, we have frequently had applicants over seventeen years of age. Such boys are too old for the Homes, but we have often been able to find employment for them, and sometimes we have given temporary help until suitable work and lodgings have been found."

During the past year a number of boys who had run away from homes in London or the country have applied for admission to the Homes, and have been restored to their parents. These boys at first invariably withhold the truth as to their friends and antecedents, in some cases telling most romantic stories as to how they have become orphans and friendless. The superintendents have had too much experience with really friendless and destitute boys for them to be easily deceived. After a time, by kindness and firmness, the real facts are divulged, and, anxious parents having been telegraphed for, speedy reconciliation results. Very touching have been some of these scenes, and not only have the lads been saved from ruin by being rescued from the common lodging-house or the streets, but often have they been impressed by kind words from the superintendent.

Encouraging news concerning old boys has been received during the past year, some of the interviews being with men who were boys in the Homes twenty-five or thirty years ago. The communications from old boys are not always records of success; unlooked-for troubles come upon them as they do upon other folk.

HERE IS A SAD INSTANCE:—

In 1899 an old boy, R. S——, a married man, now aged 40, was returning home by train from work, and whilst standing on the platform, owing to the crowd being very great, he was accidentally pushed off, and fell upon the rail, narrowly escaping being killed by a passing goods train. He was so badly crushed that he had to have both feet and a leg amputated. In his distress he wrote to the treasurer asking if he could assist him to get Surgical Aid letters to procure artificial limbs. With the kind help of subscribers a sufficient number of the letters were collected. He has continued all the years since he left the Home a member of the choir of his church, and concludes his letter by saying how very happy he is under God's care and blessing.

There are seven homes in London, and in each of these the most important portion of the work is held to be the religious training which the boys receive. The boys are also taught to take an interest in home and foreign Mission Work, and many are regular contributors to such work. Between 400 and 500 boys are received during the year. The offices of the Homes are at 12, Buckingham Street, Strand; and the treasurer is the Hon. T. H. W. Pelham.

Cabmen's Letter Mission.—Many cheering testimonies, spoken and written, give assurance as to the silent ministry of the four-page leaflets circulated by this Mission. In addition to the monthly distribution of 14,000 letters, many of the workers have inaugurated shelter meetings, sick clubs, savings banks, harness-room meetings, Bible classes, &c. A Cabmen's Bible Reading Union is being successfully sustained among the men, and a Total Abstinence Union is being formed. Miss Marion McBryde Broun, 20, Brookside, Cambridge, will have pleasure in giving fuller details of this effort to reach the cabbies with the Gospel.

"Woman's Mission to Women."

THIS is the watchword title of the Female Mission to the Fallen, the forty-second report of which is before us. We make a brief extract:—

"Woman's Mission to Women deals with both classes; indeed, it may be said, with three classes:—(1) Young women who have not fallen, but are in grave danger; (2) Those who have taken the first downward step; (3) Those who have been for some time living in sin.

"The placing of young women in Homes is only a part of the work of the Mission, although a very important part; nor must it be forgotten that before a girl goes to a Home much time and labour and money are often expended upon her by the Mission in many ways. It may be she has been frequently met and visited, her friends have been communicated with, her antecedents ascertained, her health attended to. Sometimes she has been sheltered for weeks in the Mission House, and it is only with much prayerful thought and some anxiety, approaching to that with which a parent first parts with a child when going to school, that the missionary places her protégée in the Home, generally at a long distance from the scenes of former temptations and from the influence of evil acquaintances."

The report deals with cases of girls (1) placed in service, (2) restored to friends, (3) and sent to hospitals and infirmaries. The work is primarily spiritual, and there are many indications that the labours of the missionaries have not been fruitless. A thousand girls reached every year, of whom about 260 are placed in Homes and about 200 sent to situations, a constant correspondence with those who have been helped in former years, frequent visits from old girls, the hundred children boarded out through the Mission and paid for through the Mission by the fathers or mothers—these are a few undeniable evidences that the Mission is accomplishing, with no small measure of success, the objects for which it was established.

The office of the Mission is 32, Charing Cross, S.W., Mr. A. J. S. Maddison, secretary.

Sermon Lane Mission, N.

A MEETING of a very interesting character was held at the above Mission on Friday evening, November 23, in a formal way to inaugurate the winter campaign.

The workers, about sixty in number, gathered on social lines under the chairmanship of the president, Mr. J. Dix Lewis, J.P., when the following ministers gave addresses:—Rev. C. J. Parker, M.A., the vicar of Clerkenwell; Rev. J. G. Henderson, Congregational Church, Islington; and Rev. Dr. Hall, Presbyterian Church, Colebrook Row.

At a subsequent Conference, the heads of departments reported on their work, and finally Mr. Edward C. Cuthbert, the superintendent, gave some interesting details of the Gospel services and his daily visitations to the poor of the neighbourhood.

In Cattle Show Week, the boardmen will have their usual soup distribution, and during the severe winter weather this will be continued twice a week.

The usual Christmas appeal for £400 is now being issued. For upwards of half a century excellent philanthropic work has been done, and on strictly undenominational lines. We heartily wish it continued and uninterrupted success. The treasurer is Mr. Dix Lewis, Penrhyn, Hornsey Lane, N.; the hon. secretary, Mr. Cooksey, 52, Amwell Street, E.C.

Bermondsey Dock and Wharf Labourers.—One of the numerous institutions founded by the late Earl of Shaftesbury, and the late Miss Charlesworth, is Stephen-the-Yeoman Ragged School and Mission. Situate in one of the poorest parts of South London, its operations are principally among dock and wharf labourers and their families. The efforts comprise Sunday and day schools, mission services, mother's meetings, etc. Three branches of the work that have lain dormant were revived last year, viz., the lads' gymnasium, flower show, and free breakfasts. A detailed account of the varied and useful agencies of the mission is furnished in the annual report, copies of which may be obtained from the secretary, Mr. H. J. Gough, at the schools, Marigold Place, Cherry Garden St., Jamaica Road, Bermondsey, S.E.

Homes of Hope.

OF all classes of people who have been dragged down the terrible vortex of iniquity, those who are known as the fallen ones are the most to be pitied and commiserated. Having lost their most precious heritage, bereft of what should be held most dear—purity and honour—and forsaken by those by whom they have been cruelly robbed, little wonder is it that the burden of a guilty conscience and the torture of self-reproach and shame invariably lead to a wretched existence and an untimely end. Happily there are agencies through which efforts are made to reclaim and restore these, and among such institutions the Homes of Hope are deserving of attention and support.

Since the Homes were established, 5,048 have been admitted. Of this number 3,035 belong to the class of young mothers, and have been thus saved from falling into deeper and continued sin. Over 800 were also rescued from surroundings of temptation unfallen. The inmates are trained in household and domestic duties, but the primary aim ever before the society is to awaken in their hearts a sense of their need of a Saviour. To this end services are held and instruction and counsel are imparted by the matrons.

Repentance toward God and faith in Jesus Christ are advanced as the only foundation of permanent reformation, and the committee are cheered and encouraged by many evidences of conversion. Friends of the society have the satisfaction of knowing they are enabling young women to recover themselves from the snare into which they have fallen, and afforded an opportunity of redeeming their character.

Copies of the annual report may be had of the Secretary, 4, Regent Square, W.C.

Waiting for Dinner.

"ISN'T GOD good?" said a Christian mother in my district. "We did not know what to do this afternoon before Johnnie came home from school for his dinner. He comes home so hungry, and to-day we had only a little crust of bread and half a cup of milk. But I prayed about it, and then the thought came to make it into bread and milk, But when Johnnie came in I said, 'I have something nice to-day, here is warm bread and milk'; and, just fancy, Miss, he was quite pleased!" "But," said the visitor, "what did you do yourselves?" "We could wait, we are grown up," was her quiet answer. Yet this meant, as is often the case when "the children must first be fed," that the mother patiently goes without.

Such is one of the experiences reported by Mildmay Mission workers among the poor in London tenements, and as winter advances the sufferings of these needy ones become more acute. Several sad stories reach us of beds "without a single blanket," as well as want of food and fire; of widows, past threescore and ten, who are "old and cold;" of sick ones needing comforts and sympathy. Many are true disciples of the Lord, to whom, for his sake, it is a privilege to minister.

"How do you manage your reading?" I asked of one trying to follow the Saviour, whose sight was failing sadly. She had given up evil ways and questionable companions, and become a blessing in her house and loved her Bible. "We helps each other, Miss," was the answer. "I take my text-book down to my neighbour, and she reads, then I pray." Thus together the two humble women seek the Lord. And shall we not believe, each one—

> Your Father hears the mighty cry of anguish,
> And gives his answering messages to thee?

(Mrs.) E. Codner.

The League of Mercy.—In view of the recent appeal of the Prince of Wales' Hospital Fund to the public for subscriptions, the secretaries of the League of Mercy request us to announce that they will gladly welcome small subscriptions, from one shilling upwards, for the support of the hospitals. The offices of the League are 29, Southampton Street, Strand.

A Gift to Seamen.

MANY hundreds of Liverpool ladies and gentlemen interested in the welfare of seamen and emigrants were present on Monday of last week at the opening of the Gordon Smith Institute for Seamen.

The Institute has been erected and furnished at a cost, exclusive of the site, of £7,000 by Mr. Samuel Smith, M.P., as a memorial of his son, the late Mr. J. Gordon Smith.

Within the building two old and useful Liverpool societies which have hitherto carried on their operations from different centres—the Liverpool Seamen's Friend Society (of which Mr. Samuel Smith is president) and the Strangers' Rest—will find a permanent home. The Seamen's Friend Society dates from 1820, while the Strangers' Rest was founded in 1876 by the late Mr. Reginald Radcliffe to provide a resting-place near the Liverpool docks for foreigners.

The Institute is free to those for whom it has been designed. Indeed, the whole-hearted welcome is expressed in about a dozen languages in these terms :—"Seamen and emigrants may rest here, write their letters, or read. Nothing to pay." Both a social and a spiritual work will be conducted on lines in harmony with the wants of the classes to be benefited, and in sympathetic co-operation with kindred institutions.

In the course of the proceedings the Lord Mayor of Liverpool assured Mr. Smith that the citizens highly appreciated his great gift.

In declaring the institute open, Mr. Samuel Smith, M.P., said it was difficult for him to say much about the origin of this institute, but he felt that it will fill what would have been the wishes of the beloved son taken from him so prematurely. Its work would correspond to the unselfish life known to many friends present. Proceeding, Mr. Smith expressed the hope that the home will be a welcome refuge for many, and that Gospel preaching will be combined with such social influences as Christian workers, especially refined ladies can bring to bear on sailors. It is a winsome, cheerful kind of religion that is going to be found in this institute.

Prayer in Temperance Work.

THE committee of the Howard Association have, during the past year continued their endeavours to unite with others in promoting measures for the diminution of intemperance. In a recent report, the importance and value of prayer in combating the evil of drunkenness is wisely emphasized. In this connection some of the latest words penned by the great social reformer, Dr. Thos. Chalmers, are quoted. Shortly before his death, the Doctor was sadly disappointed at the forces of reaction and opposition which too successfully thwarted some of his own endeavours, wrote :—

I have been set on the erection of my Babel—on the establishment of at least two great objects, which, however right in themselves, become the mere idols of a fond and proud imagination, in as far as they are not prosecuted with a feeling of dependence upon God and a supreme desire after his glory. These two objects are the deliverance of our Empire from pauperism, and the establishment of an adequate machinery for the Christian and general instruction of our whole population. I am sure that, in the advancement of these, I have not taken God enough along with me, and trusted more to my own arguments and combinations among my fellows than to prayer. My views have been marvellously impeded. The barriers in the way of access to other men's minds have been as obstinate and unyielding as if I had spoken to them in foreign speech. And though I cannot resign my convictions, I must now, under the experimental sense of my own helplessness, acknowledge with all humility that except the Lord build the house, the builders build in vain.

The Association rightly insists that upon the Churches the success of effectual temperance efforts will depend, since there are but few statesmen, professional politicians or popular leaders who can be relied upon in this matter.

Homes for the Aged Poor.

FOR thirty-one years the charity known by the title of "Homes for the Aged Poor" has been carrying on a useful work among those who have to bear the double burden of age and poverty. Fifteen Homes in the metropolis and suburbs shelter no fewer than 177 aged persons, providing them with a room rent free, help in time of sickness, and, as far as funds permit, with the inestimable blessing of a cheerful fire in the dreary days of winter, when warmth is so important to those who have in most cases passed the three score years and ten allotted to man.

The problem of making the lives of the aged, whose poverty is the result of misfortune, comfortable for their last years has, to a certain extent, been solved by these Homes ; and an afternoon spent in one of them would show what a large amount of comfort can be procured at a small cost.

Help is specially needed at this season to provide coal, and at its present high price the quantity will have to be much curtailed unless generous help is afforded.

In helping these aged ones, in a large number of cases, we are caring for those who are of the household of faith, and it is a comfort to feel sure that many of the inmates in the quiet of the earthly home provided for them, have sought and found present peace, and the hope of "a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens." This charity is undenominational ; an unblemished character, and the possession of an income of from 4s. to 6s. per week in the case of single persons, and 6s. to 10s. for married couples, or pairs of sisters, are the necessary qualifications.

"A Bond-Servant of Jesus Christ."

(Rom. i. 1.)

My Saviour is my Master! I am his rightful slave!
To purchase and redeem me his precious blood He gave!
He brought me out of bondage, and loosed my captive bands,
That I might choose his service, and do his own commands.

'Tis real and perfect freedom this Master to obey ;
To seek his smile and blessing each moment of the day.
His yoke indeed is easy, his burden always light,
And those who labour for Him, He strengthens with his might.

He gives to all who seek it, the knowledge of his will,
And when He calls to service, imparts the needed skill :
He takes the earthen vessel—all stained and marred by sin—
And cleanses from defilement, and pours his grace within.

Thrice happy are the servants who serve this gracious Lord ;
A life of loving service will yield a great reward :
For those who now confess Him, and his reproach who bear,
Shall, in his heavenly kingdom, their Master's glory share!

London City Police.

THE Institute opened in Sussex Place, Leadenhall Street, for the benefit of the City Police serves a useful purpose, and the various branches of work connected with it are making good progress. A large number of religious, educational, and social meetings are held weekly. The Institute is maintained on a sound Evangelical basis, and the atmosphere is one of spiritual fervour, the Monday evening Bible class being a notable feature. A goodly number of the members are converted men, and many instances of blessing have been traced to timely words which they have been enabled to speak while on duty. The work deserves cordial support. Mr. John McCall is the president, and the hon. secretary is Mr. Herbert Leng, 49, Leadenhall Street, E.C.

Cripple Children.

A BRANCH of the Glasgow United Evangelistic Association's work that has recently entered on a fuller stage of development is the Mission to Cripple Children. Through the "Fresh-air Fortnight" and other movements, it has been found that throughout the city of Glasgow, and particularly in the poorer districts, there are hundreds of cripple, deformed, and otherwise disabled young people. Many of these, through poverty and other causes, are denied even the ordinary home comforts which might make their sad lives a little brighter.

To seek to reach and help these needy ones the Cripple Children's League of Kindness has been formed. The idea is to place each young cripple under the care of a sympathetic individual, who, on accepting the duty, becomes a member of the League. All who join the League promise to write at least once a month to their cripple, and to do what they can to make the young sufferer's life a little brighter and better.

Friends desiring to help in this work can have membership cards, which are issued from the Central Offices, 64, Bothwell Street, Glasgow, and the name, address, and other particulars of the cripple allocated to them. William Masson, Secretary.

Open Doors.

What are you living for? Time hastens on,
To-day, with its openings, soon will be gone.
Many an aching heart, saddened and tried,
Waits for some sympathy close by your side.

Many a suffering one, bearing his pain,
Seeks some to help him go forward again.
Many a young life, blighted through sin,
Longs, with your counsel, afresh to begin.

Many a fallen one, facing despair,
Cries for some brother his burden to share.
Many a tempted one, weak 'gainst the foe,
Is secretly longing some strong friend to know.

Many a doubting heart, fearful, oppress'd,
Wants you to guide it, lead it to rest.
Many a heathen land, still dark as night,
Calls to Christ's soldiers, "Bring us the light."

Many a home field, as yet undermann'd,
Needs you to succour, give them a hand.
What are you living for? Why do you stay?
Numberless openings confront you to-day.

The Harvest Field.

I saw the Master standing
Within his harvest field,
He came the corn to gather,
For labourers He appealed.
I heard some answer Jesus,
"The work is far too hard,
Our strength's unequal to the task.
And what is thy reward?"

The Master answered sweetly,
"No man has strength too small
To gather some of these rich sheaves,
Therefore accept my call ;
According to the task the strength
To each is meted out,
None are ashamed who labour here
In love, and free from doubt."

"But tell us thy reward," said they,
Then answered He, "'Tis this,
Ye shall have gathered in my corn :
Therein is perfect bliss.
To give Me joy is to secure,
Throughout eternity,
The vision whence flow streams of peace,
And true felicity."

I leapt and knelt before Him,
I said, "Accept these hands,
Good Master, let me serve Thee.
Give me thy royal commands ;
My meat and drink shall henceforth
Be just to do thy will,
My joy that I'm permitted
My Lord's joy to fulfil."

HOLT'S HISTORICAL TALES.
The Rev. Prebendary WEBB-PEPLOE, Vicar of St. Paul's, Onslow Square.
"Stories must be had in the present day. Therefore let the stories be of the best. Miss Emily Holt's are known to bear this character before all men; and I cannot doubt that Messrs. Shaw will be doing good work for the nation if by a cheap issue of her works they can secure for them a wider circulation, and thus lead to a wider appreciation of the blessings secured to us by the Reformation."

HOLT'S TALES.
Mrs. W. R. ARBUTHNOT, President of "The Women's Protestant Union."
"I think that, in view of the present solemn and important crisis in our religious history, our first and most pressing duty is to warn and instruct the young, and the means by which you now propose to do this seem well calculated to ensure the desired object."

HOLT'S HISTORICAL TALES.
"THE LADIES' LEAGUE GAZETTE" says of them:
"Stories like these fill a distinct want in the present day. They are written with a vigour and vividness of description which at once excite attention, and their historical accuracy is a distinctive feature, giving a good idea of the life of early and mediæval times. The tone is a healthy as well as a religious one, and many parents to whom it is becoming an increasing difficulty to find books conveying religious teaching they can rely on will find what they want in any one of Miss Holt's volumes of most interesting stories."

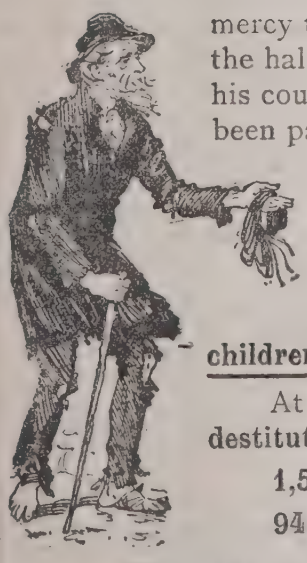
THE DARKEST ENGLAND SOCIAL SCHEME.

ITS CHRISTLIKE WORK AND URGENT NEED.



The Slum-Officer, during her visitation of the lowest hovels, on her mission of mercy to help the Poorest to help themselves—the truest form of Charity—had found the half-starved babe lying alone on a straw bag. The Reservist-father was fighting his country's battles. The mother could get neither work nor relief. Everything had been pawned for food. The devoted Officer cleansed, fed, and nursed the dying babe. The Army's Medical Officer tended it. It is getting strong, and work has been found for the grateful mother. Many thousands of such cases are helped by the 150 Slum Officers at 40 centres. Yet they know not where to turn for the necessary financial help. The winter is almost upon us, and already we turn away from our Shelters scores of men, women, and children nightly. Can you send us any help on their behalf?

At Home and Abroad, no less than 5,977,890 Cheap Meals were supplied to destitute men, women, and children last year, and 3,846,015 lodged.

1,570 Ex-criminals were received into our Prison Gate Homes and Refuges.

94 Rescue Homes received 5,158 Girls last year, most of whom are satisfactory.

No less than 16,676 People can be Housed, Fed, and Helped Nightly.

WILL YOU HELP THIS LABOUR OF LOVE?

Messrs. MORGAN AND SCOTT beg to announce

A New Penny Magazine for the Children:

UNCLE BEN'S BUDGET,

Edited by W. STANLEY MARTIN.

Author of "Some Famous Bonfires," etc., etc.

IN issuing this new periodical for the children, the Editor and Publishers aim at supplying the children with a magazine that, while written in an interesting and taking style, will adhere to thoroughly Evangelical teaching. It is intended that it shall be a periodical that parents, teachers, and all interested in the welfare of the young can safely circulate, for they may rest assured that nought but what is good, wholesome, and Scriptural shall be admitted to its pages.

Recognising the efforts that Romanism and Ritualism are making to gain the children, it is hoped that the decidedly Protestant tone of "Uncle Ben's Budget" will command the support of all who are earnestly desirous that as regards our Protestant privileges the children should keep to the "old paths."

"UNCLE BEN'S BUDGET"

aims at presenting old-fashioned truths in new-fashioned language, and in fostering a love for the Word of God.

It is fully and artistically illustrated, and its contents are

PITHY, POINTED, and PROTESTANT.

American Blind Singers.

Mr. and Mrs. BAKER, of Philadelphia.

THE spiritual awakening among the masses of London which has come during the past two years in connection with the Tent Campaign has had much to do with bringing into public notice the Gospel singing of Mr. and Mrs. Baker, the blind singers of Philadelphia. Those worthy evangelists are held in esteem for the with which they sound forth in song the message of Divine love and man's redemption through the precious blood of Christ.

Free from the academic stiffness which characterizes so much of the religious singing of the day, and from all touch of professionalism, their singing combines distinctness with evangelistic fervour. There is intensity as well as pathos, and the singers occasionally give words of spoken testimony which lose nothing in effect upon a crowd because of their homely character, salted with caustic Pennsylvanian colloquialisms.

Mr. Baker was born in 1840, and although there was no church or meeting in the vicinity of his home, he had the advantage of Christian nurture. "My mother," he says, "used to read the Bible to me, and, because I was blind, I liked to stay with her." He was converted at a Methodist service, at the age of seventeen. He had sought to support himself by singing secular music, but he was always peculiarly drawn towards sacred solos, for, he says, "I loved to sing the hymns my mother sang, which she taught me. And so, through many providences as well as my own convictions, I was led to forsake the secular and TAKE UP THE SACRED."

In 1884, Mr. Baker was united in marriage to Miss Katie Smith, and the couple resolved to consecrate their voices to the service of God.

Mrs. Baker comes from Camden, New Jersey. Her father had been in the United States naval service. His little daughter became blind, as the result of the improper use of an acid, when she was but five months old. After her father's death she was sent, at the age of ten, to the Institution for the Instruction of the Blind, in Philadelphia, where she received an education in which religious instruction occupied an important place. For a time she sang and played at concerts, but through conscientious conviction and her marriage, she was led heartily to devote her talent of music to evangelistic service. "I hope," she says, "to spend my life in this way. I love the work with all my heart."

Helped to commence evangelistic labours by Rev. Dr. John Pedie, of the Fifth Baptist Church, Philadelphia, Mr. and Mrs. Baker have found many opportunities for service in various cities of the United States; and in 1898, as many of our readers are aware, they came to England at the invitation of Mr. Leonard Weaver, who had inaugurated the

LONDON TENT CAMPAIGN.

Since arriving here Mr. and Mrs. Baker have laboured in connection with that movement, and have also taken part in many other meetings in the interests of evangelistic and philanthrophic organizations. They are about to resume their work in America, and a public farewell was accordingly arranged by their many well-wishers. The gathering was held on Tuesday of last week, in the Great Assembly Hall, Mile End, when testimonies to the value of the singers' work were given by the chairman, Mr. R. C. Morgan, by Mr. Walter Notman, who spoke for the congregation at Dr. Barnardo's "Edinburgh Castle," by Mr. J. W. C. Fegan, and other friends. A pleasing feature of the occasion was the presentation to Mr. and Mrs. Baker, of a purse of money (£70 odd) as a token of regard for their consistent character, and their labours in the evangelistic cause. Mr. F. N. Charrington, in handing the gift to Mr. Baker, said how deeply he had been touched by the pathos of their singing, and was glad to assure them of the general esteem in which they are held for their work's sake. Both Mr. and Mrs. Baker briefly replied, recalling some of their experiences among us, and bidding their friends an affectionate farewell. During the evening they sang some of their best known songs: "I'll go where you want me to go," "I shall know him," and "Looking this way," the audience joining in the refrains with great spirit.

Mr. Leonard Weaver, with whom the singers had long been associated, writes: "I shall never forget the first time I heard these singers. It was at a convention of Christian workers in Boston, U.S.A., where a vast crowd was moved to tears as they sang, 'My Father is guiding the helm.' Since they came to this country they have been used of God in winning many souls for Christ. I venture to believe that tens of thousands will carry with them the memory of these beloved people, and that their songs will bring inspiration and blessing for years to come."

Mr. and Mrs. Baker sail for America on Thursday, December 6, in the s.s. Minnehaha.

The Paris Exposition.—The New York Outlook commissioned a representative to prepare an article on the subject of the "Exposition's Religious Aspects." At the end of his search the commissioner cabled his report in one sentence, "The Exposition has no religious aspects." The authorities had resolved on the absolute exclusion of religious organizations. The name of God was excluded from all mention in the opening and closing ceremonies. A noted dancer, with a performance representing the progress of the century, was allowed a whole theatre, but the Church was absolutely excluded, and all the work of civilization and regeneration done in the name of religion was ignored. Even the special services, arranged outside the Exposition grounds by various denominations, were discouraging so far as numbers were concerned. The general impression of the Exposition Universelle was that of purely material civilization, unleavened by any spiritual element whatever.

Scripture Readers' Society for Ireland.

AT this season many friends of this venerable and valuable Society have for years past been accustomed to receive from the secretary, Capt. James Kearney White, a few words of kindly Christian greeting. They will hardly be prepared, therefore, to learn that, although he still hopes to take as deep an interest as ever in the prosperity of the Society, to the management of which he has devoted so many years of a long active life, he has thought well to retire from the more onerous duties of the secretaryship. In a touching letter to the Committee he made known his intention, and the friends with whom he has collaborated for so long a period, did themselves honour by setting on record their very grateful sense of the services he had rendered for nearly twenty-nine years.

The Dublin papers report that, on November 6, a special meeting of the committee was held at the Society's offices in Lower Pembroke Street, under the presidency of Rev. Dr. Spence, of Belfast, to take into consideration the letter of resignation which had been addressed to them. After prayer and deliberation, resolutions were adopted, accepting with the deepest regret, the resignation of Captain White, and placing on record high appreciation of the services rendered to the Society by himself and Mrs. White. While making arrangements to fill the vacant post of secretary, the committee invited Captain White to permit his valued name to be still associated with the Society, and to allow himself to be nominated as honorary secretary.

It will delight many friends of the Society amongst the readers of The Christian, to know that the now honorary secretary and Mrs. White will still continue to assist in every possible way the work with which they have so long been connected. At the present time Captain Kearney White's health is better than it has been for some years.

The "Cider System."

A CORRESPONDENT writes: "One of the evils which exists in the West of England, and which is a formidable barrier to Christian work, is the "Cider System" prevailing in the cider districts, in the part payment of wages in cider—a system which prevails in Somerset, Devon, Gloucester, and Hereford. The system lays the foundation of drinking habits, and draws in the young lads from our Bands of Hope when they leave the day-school and take to field labour. As a member of a temperance committee which has been recently formed to consider the whole question, I should be very grateful for any information which could be furnished by any of your readers, who may have adopted, on their own farms, the plan—(1) Of making a money payment in lieu of cider; (2) of turning the apples into jam, jelly, &c.; (3) of grafting on table fruit."

Particulars on these points, and also as to the effect on workmen and the farms, which has resulted from the abolition of the system, would be gratefully received by M. A., 1, Whitehall Gardens, London, S.W.

The Value of Small Gifts is shown by the fact that the "shilling fund," which was organized a short time ago in the diocese of Lichfield, "as a thankoffering for mercies vouchsafed to the country during the century now drawing to a close," has reached the sum of £7,117, the money being intended to help the erection of churches and mission rooms. A similar course is being taken in the diocese of Salisbury, 500,000 shillings being asked for.

Day by Day.

SUNDAY, December 9. Jeremiah xxxii.

THE incident of this chapter is deeply significant. The prophet was in prison. The armies of the Chaldeans were around the city; there was no doubt as to the ultimate fate of the country, it would be most certainly annexed to the vast empire of Babylon. But the prophet was so sure that it would finally return to his people, that he bought for himself and posterity a piece of land, then on sale by his cousin. This proved his faith, not only that Israel would return to the land given of old to their fathers, but that the lines of genealogy, and the rights of families to certain portions of the soil, would remain unaltered.

How sublime the prayer to Him who has made heaven and earth, and to whom nothing is too hard! When we take steps which are apparently contradicted by common sense, but because we are borne forward by an irresistible impulse, let us refuse to consider difficulties; decline to argue with men whose reasonings do not go beyond the horizon of this world. Do not even feel the pulse of your faith to ascertain whether it is strong enough for the ordeal. Look away to God. Let creation be a gauge of his mighty power, and reckon upon Him. "If we believe not, He remaineth faithful; He cannot deny Himself." It is not a question of what is likely, according to human estimate; it is not a matter of ease or difficulty as judged by human standards; you have only to consider how great God is, how full of love, how eager to help those whose heart is perfect towards Him, and then to step out into what may seem an utter absurdity in the eyes of your fellowmen. The misty void will become rock beneath your feet.

MONDAY, December 10. Jeremiah xxxiii.

In the forefront of this chapter stands that memorable promise, "Call unto Me, &c." (3). Note the translation of the R.V., "Great and difficult," or "inaccessible," things. The lamented George Macgregor used to say that the Church had not half taken in all that God meant when He allowed us to go to Him with our requests. Difficult things become easy, inaccessible things dissolve like cloud mountains, to those who have learnt how to pray. It is always more important to get the ear of God than the ear of man. Time spent before God just now is likely to be specially productive. That the great simultaneous Mission among the Free Churches in the beginning of the new century may be fraught with the richest spiritual energy; that the union between the Free and United Presbyterian Churches may proceed satisfactorily, and become organic; that the agony in South Africa may be allayed, not by sword and fire, but by the wise hand of a Christian statesman; and that the Lord would shortly hasten his kingdom—what subjects for prayer are here!

These paragraphs are charged with the most gracious promises of what the good Lord, whose mercy endureth for ever, would do for his people, not only in the return under Ezra, but in the gift of the Branch, and in the ultimate glory of Israel in the Millennium! But for each of these things He will be inquired of. His covenant is unchangeable, as the procession of day and night, but prayer is a necessary link in its consummation.

TUESDAY, December 11. Jeremiah xxxiv.

God always takes the part of the oppressed. There is not a slave that cries to Him, whose petition is not registered and remembered; not a sigh of the fainting captive of the Arab slaver, as he drops exhausted on the line of march, that does not receive instant attention. All the wrongs of underpaid and overworked servants; of employés taxed beyond their strength in vitiated atmosphere; of the poor seamstresses who are "sweated" by middlemen, or wealthy firms, as they pile up fortunes wrung from the blood and tears of the destitute; all these enter into the heart of the Lord God of Sabaoth, and, as in this chapter, He arises to take their side.

With the most solemn oath (v. 19), the princes, priests, and people, had bound themselves to liberate their slaves—a wise policy, because it made them so much more eager to stand in the defence of the city. Then, for some whim, they had cancelled their determination, and brought their newly-emancipated servants into their former condition. Ah, what a sigh broke from thousands of liberated slaves, as the cup from which they had quaffed the sweets of liberty was rudely dashed from their hands! For this violation of their solemn covenant, Jerusalem was irremediably devoted to destruction. For, let it be understood, that the violation of righteousness is avenged, not hereafter only, but here. God has his processes of justice so exactly regulated, that in this world we reap as we sow; we drink the cup that we have mixed for others; our crime comes home to roost.

How comforting it is to know that we deal with an unchangeable God, who has set us free so absolutely that there is no fear of our being brought back again to slavery, if only we abide in union with the Great Liberator, Christ.

WEDNESDAY, December 12. Jeremiah xxxv.

Amidst the refugees who had come in from the neighbouring country to seek asylum within the walls of Jerusalem, was a strange group of what we might call Bedouin Arabs. Probably they encamped in one of the squares, or open places, within the city. Their characteristic was the tenacity with which they held to the regulations, which Jonadab had promulgated some 300 years before (Judges i. 16; 2 Kings x. 15; 1 Chron. ii. 55).

These regulations were threefold. First, they were to drink no wine; second, they were to refrain from settling in any country; thirdly, they should dwell in tents. These prescriptions were no doubt intended to save them from becoming enervated by the luxury which wealth breeds. They were to be always a pastoral, pilgrim people. There is something for us to learn from these restrictions. We too should do well to abstain from alcohol, not only for our own sakes, but because of the havoc it is working throughout our land. We should see to it that we do not strike our roots too deeply into this world, which passeth away, but live in the will of God to use whatever He gives for his glory as his stewards. And lastly, we should cultivate the pilgrim spirit, which abstains from all worldly lusts that war against the soul. O children of God, remember that this is not your rest. Be it yours, like Jacob, to carry a staff, till you lean upon it in death, the symbol of the pilgrim life.

How true the Rechabites were to their ancestors' regulations! Israel had not been equally true to God's. Therefore the one people have been preserved even to the present day, as travellers tell us; whilst Jerusalem fell. Obedience is the only source of permanence. "He that doeth the will of God abideth for ever."

THURSDAY, December 13. Jeremiah xxxvi.

A striking scene is recorded in this chapter! The roll written closely with words of doom was read in the ears of the people in the Lord's House, by Baruch, the faithful friend of the imprisoned prophet. Because of the sensation they caused, the words of the roll were afterwards recited before the princes, and presently before the king. When God wants his words read, He will see to it that they are read. Truth shall be proclaimed upon the house-tops. There may be a conspiracy of silence, but it will not stand; there may be a conspiracy of misrepresentation, as in the case of Cromwell, but it will not avail. God's Word shall be promulgated even by the lips of his enemies.

Were it possible, it would be pleasant to take this incident as an illustration of the method of inspiration. But we forbear, because it is so important to emphasize how futile are the attempts of man to destroy God's truth. At the most he only succeeds in cutting up and burning the material on which the Divine message is inscribed, but this does not affect the message itself. It is as though the drunken crew should strike down the man at the look-out, who brings them the unwelcome tidings that the ship is making straight for the horrid teeth of the reef, or that they should tear to atoms the chart that announces its proximity.

We are all disposed to cut out of the Bible those parts of it which condemn us. It would be wiser meekly to listen to what the Lord God has to say, sure that He has our highest good at heart.

FRIDAY, December 14. Jeremiah xxxvii.

There was a cessation in the rigour of Jeremiah's sufferings, during the approach of the Egyptian army, which caused the Chaldeans to draw off temporarily. No doubt the withdrawal of the hated Chaldeans caused a great revulsion of feeling throughout Jerusalem, derision of Jeremiah, and the exultation of the false prophets. But God's servant never hesitated for a moment in his conviction that the city must fall. Notice the remarkable affirmation of v. 10.

It was only natural that he should desire to separate himself. The question has been asked lately, if missionaries are bound to stay with their flocks in the face of impending martyrdom; and some light is thrown on the question by the prophet's action. When testimony for God has been clearly given, when native converts do not require the stimulus nor direction of the servant of God, when the cause of truth cannot be further served, when the valuable life would only be sacrificed in indiscriminate slaughter, which might afterwards be devoted to the highest ends—there seems no reason why an effort should not be made to secure immunity from suffering and death. Hence Jeremiah resolved to leave Jerusalem; Paul left Ephesus, and the Master said, "If ye are persecuted in one city, flee to another."

The whole incident, so far as Jeremiah was concerned, was made ultimately to subserve his good, for he came under the royal protection, was secured within the walls of the prison from any sudden popular excitement, and was certain of receiving food amid the severest extremities of the siege. The wrath of man is made to praise God. Through clouds and storm, he gently clears our way. Our Father makes no mistakes, but can overrule our mistakes and our enemies' hatred.

SATURDAY, December 15. Jeremiah xxxviii.

This chapter is full of interest:

(1) There is the kindly action of the good Ethiopian Ebed-Melech, through whose intervention the life of Jeremiah was spared. It is always a pleasant thing to remember that he put rags and clouts around the ropes, that they might not cut the worn and emaciated limbs of the much-persecuted prophet. Many people are well-meaning, but singularly destitute of consideration. They do acts of kindness in a rough and ruthless manner; they let down the ropes, but forget the soft pad. Let us be intent on helping people out of the pits, in which they are like to die, but let us do so gently, tenderly, and thoughtfully.

(2) The interview between the king and prophet. What a contrast between the courage of the prophet and the pusillanimity of the king! It might have seemed as though the whole future of Jeremiah depended on his speaking soft and reassuring words to Zedekiah, but he was resolute in declaring the whole counsel of God. Poor prophet as he was, utterly dependent on the royal favour, he did not palter with truth. The king, on the other hand, feared the Jews, in spite of the reassurances which the prophet gave that they should not hurt him. Cowper sang truly:

> He is a freeman whom the truth makes free,
> And all are slaves beside.

(3) Jeremiah's reticence (27, 28). We are not bound to say everything we know, unless, indeed, we profess to be telling everything. There is a time to be silent, to keep our own counsel, and to withhold information on matters concerning which others have no right to question us. There is no sin against the majesty of truth when we resist the impertinence of curiosity and malice, and hold our peace.

Young People.

* I want to interest my* ELDER "Young People" every week in what Mr. Meyer writes on the Christian Endeavour Topic. Parents will also find the S.S. Lesson Notes suggestive and helpful for Sunday talks with their young folk. (See next page.)

What to Read this Week.

THIS is our Home Mission week, but it so happens that a large proportion of THE CHRISTIAN to-day is devoted to the same subject (pages 19-30).

Therefore, instead of giving you a separate article on the subject, I am sure you will be interested in reading the stories of "Rodney" and "Little Peggy," on page 20, and there are several other articles describing work amongst children, on the succeeding pages, some of which I am sure your parents will be glad to talk to you about.

Fighting Our Friends.

I WONDER how many of you went to see the "welcome home" given to the C.I.V.'s. It is rather late I know to talk about that now, but I learned a lesson from it which it is not too late to pass on to you.

When these brave, strong young men came back from South Africa to London, they found the whole City decorated with flags and banners, and enormous crowds gathered in the streets to welcome them. But the welcome was almost too hearty, and their friends too numerous, for the procession to pass comfortably along; and every now and again the C.I.V.'s would actually have to charge the crowd in order to get through to their destination at all. They were on their way to St. Paul's Cathedral to attend a Thanksgiving Service for their safe return.

Now these men had faced real enemies in battle, but there they knew who were their enemies, and were not surprised at the stubborn opposition that they had to meet; but when they came home they found it was their well-wishers and friends who so seriously hindered their progress as they marched through the streets.

Now here comes the lesson. We all have our foes to fight, our evil tempers and habits, and many of the more serious temptations that Satan puts before us. We generally know that these are evil, and that we must fight against them. But there are other temptations that come to us in an almost friendly way (and, indeed, sometimes from our friends and companions), and it is not always easy to recognise that these friendly temptations are as great hindrances to our spiritual progress in one way, as the more directly evil ones are in another.

I want you, therefore, to be well on your guard against all temptations which come to you, as it were, in a friendly way, because these are often quite as dangerous as those which you know at once to be evil.

Perhaps you saw in the papers a long letter from Lord Roberts, begging the English public not to offer drink to the soldiers when they returned. He had in his mind exactly the same idea I have brought before you, namely, the temptations which come through friends, which are on that account all the harder to meet. Perhaps you will find this all the more so about Christmas time. Pray that God may keep you then and now.

HOW TO LISTEN (Matt. xiii. 1-23).

THE Lord read his sermons off the page of nature, printed in the yellow of the cornfields, the green of the pasture-lands, the deep-blue of the lake. His heart was the home of beautiful conceptions, as fresh as the dew that daily bathed the hills in whose bosom the lake lay.

There are three ways of missing permanent benefit from Gospel preaching. (1) You may be superficial. Many people are bird-witted. They do not fix their attention. Their mind lies open to every sparrow or pigeon that chooses to perch on the window-sill, and catch away the seed. Light flitting fancies, vagrant impulses, wandering thoughts, these perform the work of the birds in sowing time. It isn't enough to hear the word, or read it from the printed page, we must mark, learn, and inwardly digest; we must hold it fast; we must chew the cud of meditation; we must tend the tiny germ as assiduously as we do the hyacinth bulb of our winter gardens. Perhaps there is no better way of doing this than of writing out when we get home the resumé of what we have been listening to, or to record in our diary our impressions of the books we have laid down. I owe everything in the tenacity of my memory for retaining what I hear and read, to the habit of my boyhood, inculcated by my father, of keeping a permanent record. This was the happy employment of many a Sunday afternoon.

(2) You may be merely emotional. The seed fell on a soil, which but thinly covered the underlying rock, that had become heated in the intense Oriental sun. This became the forcing bed. On the one hand the rock prohibited the root from being struck into the deep, moist soil, and, in addition, it forced the growth prematurely. Passing over that field, you might suppose that the growth on such a patch was unusually promising, whereas it was most certainly doomed to wither when the sun was up. How many people "straightway spring up!" They receive the Word with joy. They believe "for a while." In the inquiry room you will find them between tears and smiles. They will be the first to seek an opportunity of publicly confessing the Saviour; it will seem impossible to exhaust the earnestness of their enthusiasm and the width of their sympathies. But when "the time of temptation" comes, when obloquy and persecution must be endured, when "tribulation ariseth because of the Word," straightway they fall away. Perhaps nothing so utterly disappoints the great hopes cherished of young people as this emotional response to the appeal of God's truth. Be never content with a merely emotional life. See that your will is engaged on God's side. Will to believe in the power of the Holy Spirit who works in you to will, and ask Him to keep you true.

(3) You may be too pre-occupied. The Lord said the thorns were the cares, that is for poor people; the riches, that is for the prosperous; and pleasures, that is for the young. How many of us bring a very small part of our nature under the culture of Christian truth; we don't concentrate our mind on it, or give ourselves wholly up to its Divine energy. Whilst we sit in the pew, the mind is ranging over the earth, making Alpine ascents or long sea voyages, purchasing a new bicycle, planning a new dress, scheming a business venture, calculating how much the fortune may be increased by a certain investment. There is room on the soil for either grain or thorns, but not for both. When the corn first emerges from the soil, it begins to wrestle with the sturdy thorn; the duel is to the death, but has only one end, "the thorns spring up and choke the seed, so that it can bring no fruit to perfection," but is choked. Bring a whole heart to the consideration of the Gospel. The blessing which it brings is promised to those that seek "with their whole heart." Whensoever the thorns intrude, reckon that you are dead to them; divert from them the nourishing juices of the soul's attention, until they atrophy. Since there is not room on the soil of your heart for both, see that it is entirely yielded to the Lord Jesus, that He may work his own pleasure. F. B. M.

International S.S. Lesson.

December 16, 1900.

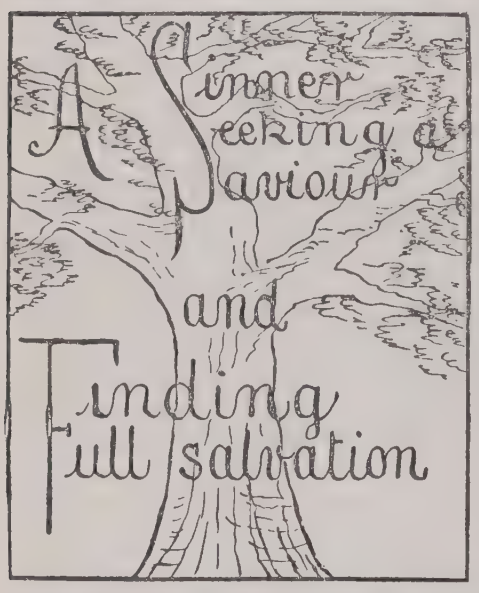
Zacchæus, the Publican (Luke xix. 1-10).

Golden Text:

THE Son of Man is come to seek and to save that which was lost (Luke xix. 10).

Introduction.

Another rich man (recall lesson for December 2), compare the two: age, position, business, character, &c.



Key to Blackboard Plan.—Zacchæus, the sinner, sought the Saviour, and he found Him. So is it always with any seeking soul, Jesus will always be found. "Seek and ye shall find;" "Him that cometh unto Me, I will, in nowise cast out," as true to-day as eighteen hundred years ago.

1. A Sinner Seeking the Saviour.

His name—(2) Zacchæus.

His occupation—(2) a publican or tax-gatherer.

His appearance—(3) small.

His reputation—(7) a sinner (Matt. ix. 11; Luke v. 30).

(3, 4) He was determined to find Jesus, nothing should hinder; he was eager to see this much-talked-of Man.

We know the story so well, and what he did; but the best of all is that Jesus knew all about it. He who ever looks into men's hearts, saw here beneath the surface a heart longing for Himself, and so when He gets under the tree He stopped (5). He looked up amongst the branches. He spoke: "Make haste," "I must." How full of meaning, more than ever Zacchæus expected (John i. 48; Ps. cxxxix. 1-3).

(5) "Zacchæus," called by name (John x. 3). Has He, the Great Saviour, called you by your name? Have you let Him in? (Rev. iii. 20).

2. Finding Full salvation.

(9) "This day" (Luke xxiii. 40). Shall we not let Jesus say that to us to-day?

There were three steps Zacchæus took to get this full salvation:

First, Obedience. (5, 6) "Make haste"—"He made haste;" "Come down"—"He came down."

Second, Received. (6) And more than that, he received Him joyfully, at once, with open heart, with joy and happiness, and strong faith.

Third, Consecration. (8) He wishes to do all that is right, and not by halves, but as much as ever he can.

Happy Zacchæus, what a lesson he teaches us of trusting in Christ:—Longing to see. Nothing shall hinder. Promptly obeys. Joyfully receives. Hands all over to his Lord.

(10) He was lost, but now is found; no wonder such words can be written of him as these: (9) 'This day is salvation come to this house."

Stafford Rooms, 1859-1900.

HALLOWED memories of revival days attach to Stafford Rooms. In many parts of the world workers are to be found who were brought to the Lord at this well-known centre of aggressive work. The story of Stafford Rooms forms a striking chapter in the record of the wonderful awakening of '59 and the early sixties.

The reunion of old and new members and friends held on Friday last was an occasion of spiritual refreshment and encouragement. Mr. William Holmes presided, and there was a crowded attendance. Mr. Holmes briefly outlined the history of the movement. It originated in 1856 in a hall in Marylebone Road. There were many conversions, and young men were attracted in increasing numbers. Then came the development of the Stafford Rooms work, and also that of Union Hall Mission and of the Y.W.C.A. branch. Mr. Holmes' references, at this point, to the spirit and labours of the late Henry Hull evoked expressions of hearty agreement. Fragrant memories of that devoted servant of God are cherished in hearts of all the old "Stafford Rooms men." On his death-bed Mr. Hull had expressed the desire that Mr. C. Russell Hurditch should succeed to the secretaryship. This was arranged: still the work increased, and God sealed his own Divine testimony in

THE CONVERSION OF MANY SOULS.

Following Mr. Holmes came a large number of brief, but pungent testimonies. Mr. W. H. Mills showed the widespread effect of the Stafford Rooms work. Several converts are now Church of England rectors; one has been president of the Baptist Union of Queensland; another laboured for the Bible Society in the Straits Settlements; some are missionaries in China and Japan; others evangelists and colporteurs in Africa and the United States. On many occasions, too, when Mr. Mills has come into contact with aggressive religious undertakings in this country, he has found that the originators traced their spiritual awakening to the old days at Stafford Rooms.

Pastor Frank White, who followed, spoke as "a scarred warrior." He gave some reminiscences of his labours as a tract distributor—"outside a bonnet shop," and proceeding, gave a stimulating call to renewed effort

TO EVANGELIZE THE MASSES.

The Chairman had difficulty in finding time for the many friends who were ready to testify, but the words of each speaker were earnest and helpful, if brief. Nearly all had been converted in that meeting room. Several indicated the spot where they were pointed to Christ by Mr. Hull, or by one or another of the organized band of young fellows whose particular duty was to give away tracts and "button-hole" men in the street. It was cheering to hear from a younger member that similar work is still undertaken, and proves a source of strength to the Association.

Mr. C. Russell Hurditch gave some interesting accounts of revival experiences, telling how hundreds had found the Lord while the familiar refrain, "I do believe, I will believe," was sung. Proceeding, Mr. Hurditch encouraged his hearers to go forward in full confidence that God, who blessed so wonderfully in the past, will do so again the future. Other speakers included Mr. John Lydall and Mr. Charles Cook, the latter describing the circumstances of his conversion in one of the mid-day prayer meetings.

Counties Evangelization.—In a recent report of the operations of this agency in Somerset and neighbouring counties, numerous instances are cited of the deep impression which is being made in many villages. A friend from Bristol who spent the greater part of a month with one of the workers at Enmore, returned much impressed with the results of the missions. For years before the winter tent arrived, numbers had been longing and praying that a godly testimony might be established in the village. Many were thus ready to welcome the message when the tent came. The treasurer of the work is Mr. Henry W. Case, 11, Cotham Road, Bristol.

A Spitalfields Mission.

THE annual meeting of the King Edward Ragged Schools' Institute and Mission was held on Wednesday of last week, Mr. F. A. Bevan presiding.

Mr. Charles Montague, who has been hon. secretary and superintendent for over thirty years, found a good friend in the late Duchess of Teck. The Duke and Duchess of York are still patrons.

The annual report, read by Mr. Albert Montague, showed that in a densely-populated district over 3,000 persons were influenced for good by the various operations in progress. All of the officers are unpaid, and there are in addition 100 voluntary teachers. A trained nurse, to visit the sick and the poor in their own homes, is maintained; while the ill-fed children of struggling widows have hot dinners supplied to them on three days a week during the winter. The Sunday schools show an average attendance of 1,500. There is a Christian Association for girls, as well as one for boys. There are also workshops in which boys are taught carpentering, cabinet-making, &c.; but even more important are the industrial classes for teaching girls needlework, cutting-out, knitting, dress-making, and cooking.

The spiritual work is ever to the fore, and this was never more effectively carried on than is the case at the present time. Sunday services are maintained at King Edward Street, and at the Institute at Albert Street, competent evangelists being engaged, and the attendance shows that their opportunities are valued by old and young. The Bible classes for men and women, for youths and girls, are also largely attended. The trained nurse and Bible woman have their work supplemented by lady visitors. In consequence of a decline in certain industries, there is some anxiety regarding the coming winter. The overcrowding and the rise in house-rent still continue.

Mr. Montague's address is 16, Addington Road, Bow, E.

Gospel Work in Ireland.

IT is now more than seven years since open-air preaching was first commenced in Cork by the workers of the Irish Church Missions, whose trained agents have continually maintained their witness, often with most encouraging success. A later effort by the workers of the Open-Air Mission for Ireland led to tumultuous scenes in the streets, but the preachers won the day by undaunted courage and a meekness in the face of most trying mob-violence, which gained for the sufferers considerable local sympathy. Since then the workers of both organizations have had frequent experience of the bitter antagonism of the Church of Rome; but nothing has hindered them from their work, and they have had the joy of meeting with many cases in which the word spoken has proved the message of peace and comfort to Roman Catholic hearers.

The Society's itinerants have been holding a very successful series of special meetings in some of the rural districts, and numbers of Roman Catholics have been present. The rector of one of the parishes thus visited writes as follows:—"The three agents of the I.C.M. concluded a three-nights' mission in this parish last night. It is my duty and pleasure to express through you to the Society my earnest thanks for the help given in my parish. I can scarcely imagine how meetings could be better conducted or better suited to the spiritual needs of the Romanists in this place. The speakers were full of zeal, and spoke the simple Gospel. During my ministry I often prayed that, in the dark country parts of Ireland, the Roman Catholics would be induced to listen to the pure Word of God. I thank God that I have lived to see such meetings as we have had. You will remember that, about two years ago, your agents sold in this parish about 400 portions, Testaments, &c. May I venture to express the wish that the work which only laymen can do, and which your men have done so well, will be continued."

American Notes.

GENERAL O. O. HOWARD, known throughout the country as "the Christian Soldier," celebrated his seventieth birthday on Thursday, November 8, and some of his numerous friends, former comrades and admirers planned a banquet for the occasion.

Bishop Potter, the head of the Protestant Episcopal diocese of New York, is the last to take public action either with a view to creating a sensation or producing merely a temporary effect. Yet he has furnished the city with the sensation of the week, and a sensation likely to leave behind it some very unpleasant practical results for Tammany Hall in general and certain individual police officials in particular.

The Episcopal Church has a Pro-Cathedral in Stanton Street on "the lower East Side," in connection with which a good deal of work is carried on in the teaching of trades, handicrafts, cooking, and similar useful things. The neighbourhood is a "bad" one, and it seems that two clergymen appealed to the officers of the local police station a short time ago to protect the young girls of the vicinity from those who sought to inveigle them into the dens of infamy that abound. The nature of the response to the appeal is described in a long letter written to Mayor Van Wyck (a tool of Tammany) by the Bishop. In this document, he says:

> The thing that is of consequence is, that when a minister of religion and a resident in a particular neighbourhood, whose calling and character, experience and truthfulness are all alike widely and abundantly recognised, goes to the headquarters of the police in his district to appeal to them for the protection of the young, the innocent, and the defenceless against the leprous harpies who are hired as runners and touters for the lowest and most infamous dens of vice, he is met not only with contempt and derision, but with the coarsest insult and obloquy.
> The statement now in my possession of two clergymen of the highest character contains the testimony of two men, given without exaggeration, with the most painstaking reserve and with absolute truthfulness. In substance, it is briefly this: That when one of them complained to a police captain of a condition of things in his immediate neighbourhood, whose disgusting infamy is a matter of common notoriety, a condition of things easily verified by any intelligent citizen who passes through the streets in which it exists, he was told that he lied, and that when, disheartened by such an experience, he carried his complaint to a higher authority in the police force he was met with insolent derision.
> I affirm that such a virtual safeguarding of vice in the city of New York is a burning shame to any decent and civilized community and an intolerable outrage upon those whom it especially and pre-eminently concerns.

Upon receiving this letter, the Mayor replied that he would "exert every power which the law has given to right the wrongs and to do away with the conditions of which you complain, and to secure a hearty and efficient co-operation by the Police Department with all who are working to do away with public violations of law and decency."

In his letter to the Police Board, the Mayor said:

> I call your attention to the statements in this letter relative to the conduct of two members of the police force toward citizens who called on them for official aid and assistance. An officer who insults a citizen is a disgrace to the service. You will immediately make a searching examination, and you will see to it that an offence so utterly disgraceful and outrageous is adequately punished.
> This matter must receive your active and vigorous effort, and you must at once take such official action as will do away with the conditions of which the Bishop complains.

The General Missionary Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church has been sitting in this city for several days making appropriations (amounting to more than a million of dollars) for the various fields, and listening to what workers have had to say on matters in which all are interested. Several times during the Conference some feeling has been manifested against the operations of the Roman Catholic Church. Bishop Goodsell, of Tennessee, referring to the work in Rome, said: "Our work is slow, but its value has been testified to by the Pontiff himself, who has honoured us by excommunicating everyone, teachers and pupils alike, connected with our institutions of learning. He has issued a sweeping interdict against the schools and everyone passing through the gates. This, however, has only made us more determined to wipe out a system which has transformed the former man of empire into a cringing beggar with a barrel-organ and a monkey."

Mr. J. G. Hallimond, the energetic superintendent of the Bowery Mission, has been making a special effort during the last four or five weeks to deal with the "Hooligans" who abound in the neighbourhood of his hall. On Wednesday evenings he gives a "free lunch" of light refreshments to all of these youths between the ages of fifteen and twenty-one who will come, and after they have partaken of the said "lunch" they are entertained with recitations, singing, and high-class music. Mr. Hallimond reckons that at least twenty conversions have resulted from this particular scheme, and an indirect effect is to be seen in the attendance of the Wednesday evening guests at other services during the week.

New York. ROGER MARTIN.

Scottish Notes.

THE proposal for a public thanksgiving service in connection with the disappearance of the plague from Glasgow came from Bishop Harrison. He thought St. Margaret's Episcopal Mission a suitable place, situated as it is in the centre of what was the plague-infected area.

The annual report of the Edinburgh Rescue Shelter, presented lately, is a record of a good year's work. The figures are:—Girls received, 132; returned to parents, sent to homes, fifty-nine; placed in situations, twenty-seven; sent to hospitals, four; to poorhouses or asylums, five; married or returned to husbands, four; went away, eight; died, one; left in shelter at the close of year, five. The number of cases received from the police authorities to be dealt with was thirty-nine.

At the meeting in Glasgow recently of the Women's Protestant Union, it was reported with satisfaction that throughout the year new members had continued to offer themselves spontaneously, and that a deeper tone of anxiety for aggressive work had been shown, as well as greater and more prayerful enthusiasm in the spread of Protestant truth. The convent subject is still a vexed question. Three cases of rescue from convents have been reported during the year, and prayer is asked for those engaged in this work.

We have pleasure in calling attention to a proposed extension of the work of the Bible Training Institute, Glasgow. To meet the wishes of friends in different parts of the country, arrangements are being made for Bible study and training classes in several of the large towns of the West of Scotland, under the direction of Mr. John Anderson. It is thought desirable that, as a preliminary step, a short course of three or four introductory lectures should be given at each centre, and that thereafter classes should be formed to suit the local requirements.

The guild meetings of the United Free Church, held at Perth last week, were notable for an address by Dr. Ross Taylor on "The Relation of Religion and Amusement." He showed that religion should have the fullest sympathy with everything that was true and beautiful, and that did not seek to cramp any part of our nature, least of all that part which is susceptible to the goodness of God. After referring to the extent to which the evils of betting and drinking overshadow popular sports, as well as the making of the Lord's Day a play day, he called for the consecration of this part of their lives by Christian young men, and assured them there was no power like that which they could exercise over their fellows.

An encouraging report was presented last week to the Scottish Association for Irish Missions. A considerable increase has taken place in the funds, and the colporteurs now number thirty-nine, in addition to twenty-six theological students who devote at least a portion of the summer vacation to this work. The men have visited 146,776 families, and held religious conversations in 62,047. At the same time 2391 Bibles, 2,313 Testaments, 3,334 portions of Scripture and 54,027 books have been sold, with 39,002 tracts distributed. Rev. Thomas Lyle (Dublin) said evidences abounded that the breach between priests and people is increasing, and there had been an amount of independence manifested at the recent general election which was hitherto unknown. It is being found that Roman Catholics are glad to meet with Protestants on terms that emphasise their common brotherhood. The situation, he believed, never was more favourable than at the present time; Irishmen are anxious to know the truth.

The twenty-ninth annual meeting (which really marks the thirty-sixth anniversary) in connection with Mr. Quarrier's work among Scottish orphans, was held in Glasgow a few days ago. The mere figures of the report constituted an eloquent testimony to the faithfulness with which God honours the trust of his servants; and none could listen to the story of the work without being moved by the marvellous way in which the daily grace and supply have been sufficient for the daily need. The year closed at October 31 with a balance in hand (£87), just a little more than sufficient for one day's requirements of the big family; and that, too, after £15,891 had been spent on maintenance, and £7,832 on buildings in the course of the year. The year's income for all purposes amounted to £33,549 13s. 8¾d. —which included £11,909 19s. 10½d. for the building and maintenance of the Consumption Sanatoria, in addition to which £3,000 was promised for a fire station, £1,000 for a church organ, and money to replace the workshops destroyed by fire in October, 1899. Provost Chisholm presided over the annual meeting, and addresses were delivered by Rev. Dr. James Paton, Dr. Ebenezer Duncan, and others.

While on a visit to Inverness last week, Principal Rainy spoke some plain words regarding the attitude assumed by some dissentients towards the United Free Church. He explained that he had no difficulty in respecting and sympathizing with the convictions of good men honestly opposed to union; but he had long seen a tendency on the part of some, to appeal to the worst, least considerate, and least conscientious side of popular character, with a view to filling people's minds with prejudices, and to carrying questions with a cry. There was nothing more immoral, nothing that savoured less of the fear of God, nothing so inconsistent with the mind of Christ, as conduct of this kind. The blame was not with the people who were misled, but with those who misled them. There were some of those who for the moment were divided from them —he believed by confusion or misunderstanding— whose separation would, he hoped, not be for long. But influences had been employed, which, he hoped, the union was going to kill. He hoped they would die out, he hoped they would be turned out, and turned out with the disgrace they deserved. They were not worthy of ministers, they were not worthy of Christians, they were not worthy of sincere and true men.

The usual classes in connection with the Protestant Institute of Scotland have been resumed in Edinburgh and Glasgow. Last session Professor Spence dealt specially with the two dogmas of Papal supremacy and infallibility, and this winter it is his intention to carry the investigation a step further, directing attention to some of the characteristic doctrines of the Papal Church, chiefly the position taken up to the time of the Reformation. The subject of the opening lecture at both centres was "The Fundamental Principle of Protestantism." In reply to the criticism that Protestantism is negative and destructive, while the system of the Church of Rome is positive and constructive; the lecturer explained that Protestantism is necessarily negative in respect that it is a protest against the gross errors and corruptions of the Church of Rome, but went on also to show that at the same time it affirms the great positive principle of the authority of the Word of God as the only rule of faith and practice. The other great Reformation principle was that in all matters of faith and religion every man must determine for himself, and is responsible for such determination to his own conscience and to God alone. In these two principles consisted the essence of the Reformation.

Welsh Notes.

THE Baptists of Anglesey have been holding special meetings to further the interests of the Twentieth Century Fund. A resolution that the county should contribute £2,000 to the Fund was lost, and another fixing the sum at £1,500 adopted in its stead.

The authorities of St. Teilo's Church, Cardiff, have been severely criticised for their action in applying for a licence to sell intoxicating drink in connection with a bazaar held in aid of the church funds. When the application was brought forward before the Cardiff bench, one of the magistrates gave open utterance to expressions of surprise and disapproval.

The condemnation passed recently by the Bishop of Llandaff on the present Sunday-school has led to an interesting discussion in the Press. In his recent addresses to his clergy, the Bishop of St. Asaph pressed for fuller recognition of the importance and value of the Sunday-school, and amongst the suggestions advanced for increasing their efficiency his lordship gave a high place to the employment of catechising.

The difficulty in filling the vacant secretaryship of the Calvinistic Methodist Foreign Missionary Society continues. The appointment is an important one, and has already been offered to some of the most prominent ministers of the denomination. The committee have now decided to defer further action until the meeting of the General Assembly in May. In the meantime the work will be carried on by the executive committee assisted by a temporary secretary.

World-wide Circle of Prayer.—This union, of which Rev. Canon Robinson, Birmingham, is chairman, have decided to observe January 1, 1901, as a day of special prayer and supplication, "that a revival of true religion may take place, the number of God's elect accomplished, and the coming of Christ's Kingdom hastened."

Bible Reading and Prayer Union.—The Scripture portion cards of this Union for 1901 are now ready for circulation. The daily readings are consecutive, and are taken from the more doctrinal and devotional books of the Bible. From each portion a verse is selected as the Golden Text of the day, upon which the mind may rest. Another object of the card is to encourage prayer, that will not only be personal, but will awaken and deepen the sense of the privilege and joy of membership of the Church of Christ. Mr. Sankey's Meetings.

VISITING Cardiff on Tuesday, November 26, Mr. Ira D. Sankey attracted overflowing audiences to the Park Hall. In the afternoon Mr. Alfred Thomas, M.P., presided, and in the evening Rev. Principal Edwards. The latter supported Mr. Sankey's appeal on behalf of a Gospel Singers' Training College. He thought there was need for such an institution in Wales, seeing that so many singers and go over to the music halls and theatres. It is to be hoped that the promising singers of Wales will take a leaf out of Mr. Sankey's book. The reminiscent talks and Gospel solos given by Mr. Sankey were heartily received.

Proceeding to Birmingham, Mr. Sankey held two meetings in the Town Hall. Mr. Henry Whitwell, of the Y.M.C.A., writes: "It was my privilege to act as lay secretary at the second great mission of Messrs. Moody and Sankey in 1883, and I could not but miss, on the present occasion, the preacher who is gone; but Mr. Sankey is with us—tuneful, vigorous, and convincing." After describing the afternoon meeting, at which the Lord Mayor of Birmingham presided, and Mr. Sankey's address on "Singing through Egpyt and Palestine," Mr. Whitwell proceeds: At night the chair was taken by Mr. George Cadbury, who said that the visits of Messrs. Moody and Sankey had permanently men and women in Birmingham, and had been the means of bringing about a closer union between evangelical Christians. Mr. Sankey's subject was "Memories of D. L. Moody." The description of his first meeting with Mr. Moody, and how they had worked together for twenty-eight years, was followed with intense interest. The singing of "My Ain Countrie," and the ever-welcome "Ninety and Nine," followed by prayer, brought the memorable proceedings to a conclusion. The special correspondent of a local paper wrote:—"For more than thirty years I have heard every great singer who has appeared in the Town Hall, and the list comprises nearly all the world's most famous vocalists; but I never heard one who sang with more expression, or who produced a greater emotional effect."

AFFECTED THE LIVES OF MANY

The visit to Birmingham, however, included more than the two meetings, for on the morning after his arrival Mr. Sankey was taken by his host, Mr. George Cadbury, to the service held for the workpeople at the Bourneville Cocoa Works. There were 2,000 women, all arrayed in their white working dresses, who listened with rapt attention to the brief service, which that day consisted of reading the Scriptures, prayer, and the singing by Mr. Sankey of two of his favourite hymns. A visit followed to the simple service held in the chapel at the beautiful little almshouses near by (erected by Richard Cadbury, of revered memory), and here again with a solo, accompanied by a few words appropriate to the old people gathered together.

Mr. Sankey's last public appearance in London before leaving England was at Marylebone Presbyterian Church on Monday evening. Dr. G. Hanson, in the name of his church, cordially welcomed the esteemed visitor. After a few prefatory remarks, Mr. Sankey proceeded with his Service of Sacred Song and Story.

With feeling and pathos touching scenes were recalled of the days when, side by side with Mr. Moody, the speaker had made known the way of salvation to multitudes of anxious souls. No less impressive, and occasionally amusing, were the incidents associated with the introduction and use of the several hymns which Mr. Sankey rendered. The service was cordially received by a sympathetic congregation.

Mr. Sankey is to visit Bournemouth, Dec. 7 and 8; Southampton, 10; sailing for America on Dec. 12, by Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse.

Dr. Horton on D. L. Moody.

ON Sunday evening last, in Lyndhurst Road Congregational Church, Hampstead, Rev. Dr. Horton based his monthly talk to working men and women on the Life of D. L. Moody, recently published by Messrs. Morgan and Scott. Dr. Horton read several extracts from the volume, and remarked that the great evangelist's life and character, as they are presented in "the stirring biography by his son, enable us to understand, perhaps better than any book that has recently been written, the life and character of the apostle Paul." What Moody accomplished in his sixty-two years of life, the preacher continued, gives meaning to one of those wonderful promises of Jesus Christ which we seldom venture to take quite literally —"Greater works shall ye do, because I go to my Father." When our Lord died upon the Cross, he had spoken to some thousands of his fellow-countrymen, and He had won to Himself five or six score of adherents; but when Moody died, it was roughly calculated that by his voice and his printed addresses he had spoken to about 100,000,000 of his fellow-creatures. The number of the thousands whom he won to Christ it was impossible to estimate, but the value and significance of their conversion are better understood to-day than ever before.

Dr. Horton spoke of Mr. Moody's visit to this country in 1873, as described in the "Life," as in modern biography." He mentioned that recently, when in Glasgow, he particularly inquired about that wonderful visit, and found that every one whose opinion was valuable agreed that the visit of 1873 could never be forgotten. He was told that men who are the life of the Church, and even the hope of the city at the present time, are the men who were brought to Christ by Moody's visit in 1873. Dr. Horton's personal knowledge of Mr. Moody began with the mission in the Agricultural Hall in 1875, when he was an Oxford undergraduate. It was from listening to Moody at that time that Dr. Horton got the idea, which has never left him, that the one object of every preacher of the Gospel must be in every part of his work to bring people to an instant decision for the Saviour. "I can honestly say that what I heard from that man of God never left me, and I believe it never will. I shall, to the very end of my life, make it my one purpose, as I made it then, to endeavour, when preaching, to bring my hearers to a personal decision for Jesus Christ at the moment, and not to defer to an uncertain future the step which can best be taken at once."

Proceeding, Dr. Horton observed that he never realized until he read the Life what an extraordinary work was done at the great Chicago Exhibition, and of that he intends to speak on a future occasion, as also of the wonderful things that happened on the Spree on the return voyage to America in 1891, which assimilated Moody to the Apostle Paul, by his being in a great shipwreck.

was that of Mr. Moody in his closing years, from 1893 to 1899, when he was observed by everyone in his own country, and by a great part of the civilized world. Living a life of the most beautiful humility and untiring energy, he gave his best affection, perhaps, to his little grandchildren. Coming to the last years of the evangelist's life, Dr. Horton referred to the great meetings in Kansas City, remarking that Mr. Moody believed that a great revival was coming. "I would to God that it were true!" the preacher exclaimed.

In closing, Dr. Horton put a question to his hearers, "Could not you and I do the same kind of thing that Moody did?" Of course they had not such superb energy as Mr. Moody, and they probably had not seven generations of Puritan ancestors, as Moody had on both sides; but, on the other hand, what disadvantages he had! He had no theological training, no education except that of the rough-and-tumble of a great American town; he was not a great speaker, he had no influence, no money; he had none of the outfit that is usually regarded as essential to a preacher. Moody's peculiar gifts and peculiar disadvantages seemed somewhat to neutralize one another, and suggested this conclusion—that perhaps there was not a young man in that audience, or even a young woman, who might not do what Moody did if only they would. That is to say, if they would take the Gospel in its fulness, if they would study the Bible with resolution, and if they would systematically make it their business to seek and to save souls, the very humblest and the least equipped might be crowned with the same blessing, and might receive the same reward as D. L. Moody. Why should they not?

A Clergyman's Confession.*

THIS book appears under pathetic circumstances, which occurred since it was written. Mr. Glover is on the staff of the China Inland Mission, and in making his escape from his perilous position with his wife, the latter was so fatigued that she died after her arrival at Shanghai.

This is a noteworthy, courageous, and outspoken confession of severe and long-continued exercises of soul, resulting in the writer's baptism as a believer. The Testimony consists chiefly of an exhaustive and scathing criticism of "The Office for the Public and Private Baptism of Infants," in the Book of Common Prayer. It is specially addressed to Evangelical Churchmen, whom it calls upon to consider the declaration—"Seeing now, dearly beloved brethren, that this child is REGENERATE," &c. The author asserts that, "The popular opinion, whether among rich or poor, is that if the child has been baptized it is saved; not otherwise."

Comparing the Baptismal Office and the Communion Office, Mr. Glover says:—"The language of both Offices is equally plain and simple; only in the case of the Communion Office, it is simple to the Protestant and 'sacramental' to the Ritualist; and, in the case of the Baptismal Office, it is simple to the Ritualist and 'sacramental' to the Protestant. . . . Romanism has crept its way back into the Church of England, not through the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper, but through the Sacrament of Baptism."

We could have wished that the suaviter in modo had been more combined with the fortiter in re; for some hard things are said, which, perhaps, are likely to prevent rather than to encourage a candid reading by those who are most concerned. Yet it behoves all who desire to know and preach the truth to give a careful and prayerful reading whatever appears to call in question their position.

Personalia.

Mr. and Mrs. W. Dickins (North Africa Mission) report their safe arrival at Alexandria. They found Mr. and Mrs. W. Summers on the point of leaving for Tangier.

Rev. Dr. Munhall, who recently sailed from this country for his home in the States, has arrived at Philadelphia, after a rough voyage. He was at home thirty-six hours only, having to enter upon engagements which extend to Christmas.

The Committee of the Children's Special Service Mission have invited Mr. H. M. Gooch (son of Pastor W. Fuller Gooch) to visit the Australian Colonies for twelve months, in connection with the work of the Scripture Union. Mr. Gooch hopes to sail on January 10 in the s.s. Oceana.

Rev. J. D. Kilburn has been delivering courses of lectures in Lausanne and Neuchâtel, on "Facts about the Memory and the Mind." He has been requested to deliver similar courses in Cannes and Vienna, but having undertaken to write a series of articles on this subject for several Continental papers, he has returned home for a time to Sordavala, Russia.

During her recent visit to Europe, Miss Louise Shepard aroused much attention, both in this country and on the Continent, by the clear ring of her Gospel addresses, as well as her musical gifts. Her friends will be interested to hear that Miss Shepard was married on Tuesday last, to Rev. Charles Hamilton Pridgeon. The event took place at the First Presbyterian Church, Canonsburg, Pa.

Evangelistic.

Children's Special Service Mission.

A MISSION has been conducted by Mr. Spiers at Dollar, N.B. Meetings were first held in the West United Free Church and the large church hall. The following week they were conducted in the East United Free Church, and the interest deepened to the close.

On Sabbath, November 11, the church was crowded, and a solemn sense of God's presence was realized by many. The closing night of the mission was the most impressive of all. The church was densely crowded. There can be no doubt that deep impressions were made on youthful minds. Gospel choruses were learned by the children, which many of them are singing daily, not only in their homes but in the streets. A number of young people came forward to own themselves on the Lord's side.

W. B. R. Wilson.

Bethany Hall, Glasgow.

A mission conducted by Mr. W. D. Dunn, and lasting over three weeks, has just concluded at Bethany Hall, Govanhill, Glasgow.

The week-night attendances were beyond all expectations, and on Sundays the hall was crowded. Mr. Dunn spoke with power, and his addresses were blessed to Christians as well as to the unsaved. No pressure in the way of personal dealing was exercised, but a number have confessed that they were saved while the Gospel was being preached. Mr. Dunn will be followed in his work for God by the sympathy and prayers of many here.

On account of confusion having arisen (owing to the similarity of names) between this hall and Bethany Hall, Bridgeton, it has been arranged to change the name of this hall, and from January 1 next it will be known as Hermon Hall. F. A. L.

Mr. Charles Inglis at Liverpool.

The visit of Mr. Inglis to Liverpool has been wonderfully owned of God. The only Sunday which the evangelist was able to give will long be remembered. There were crowds of eager listeners, and large numbers were under deep conviction of sin. Many Christian workers were engaged in pointing the anxious to Christ. All classes seemed to have been reached by God's Spirit, and many of the young, as well as those more advanced in years, have sought and found the Saviour.

Mr. Inglis has visited us several times before, but perhaps he has never preached with greater power than during this recent mission. His lime-light lecture on his evangelistic tour of the world was delivered towards the close of his visit, and was attended by a large audience. It was hoped that Mr. Inglis would have been able to extend the length of the mission, but his engagements have compelled him to leave for Hastings. F.

"Black Country" Meetings.

A mission has just been concluded at Netherton under the auspices of the Dudley Free Church Council. The mission was conducted by Messrs. Leonard Weaver and R. S. Bradbrook. The secretary, Rev. D. C. Chapman, writes to say that a great awakening in the town has resulted from the mission, while all the churches in the district testify to renewed life and additions to their fellowship.

An esteemed correspondent writes:—"Messrs. Leonard Weaver and R. S. Bradbrook concluded last Friday evening an evangelistic mission of eleven days' duration in the large hall of the Church Sunday-schools, known as Trinity Hall, Old Hill. The meetings throughout have been remarkably well attended; indeed, on the Sunday night there must have been about 1,300 people present—some having to stand the whole time. It has been a season of very decided spiritual revival throughout the district. The afternoon Bible Readings have been especially helpful to Christian people, while all the evening meetings have been owned of God in the ingathering of souls. There have been, thank God, numerous decisions for Christ. The proportion of men who have been led to decision has been unusually large. Thirty new members were received at the Men's Sunday Afternoon Class in Old Hill Church last Sunday afternoon, and numerous additions have also been made to similar classes in other neighbouring places of worship. God be praised for this fresh manifestation of his power and grace."

Meetings have been conducted at Kendal by Mr. James Walker. There has been much blessing among old and young.

Mr. C. Russell Hurditch has held a fruitful mission at Bradford, and Mr. Philip Hurditch has also experienced a time of blessing in a ten days' mission at Hastings.

Mr. W. R. Lane writes from Wakefield, "We had a grand meeting on Sunday afternoon, of 1,400 men." Mr. Lane's mission concluded on Monday evening. We hope to give particulars later.

At a mission held by Rev. E. Payson Hammond at Keene, U.S.A., there were large attendances of young people from churches of all denominations. There were many seekers after salvation.

A fortnight's mission has just been held in the Albert Street Mission Hall, Ryde, I.W., by Mr. Richard Spragg. Throughout the meetings there was manifest blessing, and several cases of blessing were recorded.

Mr. S. Craggs has completed a fourteen days' mission at the Primitive Methodist Chapel, Stroud, Glos. Many will remember the evangelist's visit. Blessing has followed the preaching of the Word. Christians have been helped and blessed.

A twelve days' mission has been conducted at St. Neots by Mr. George Andrews, of Willesden Hall. Our brother has preached the Gospel earnestly and faithfully. Several were brought to the Lord. The afternoon Bible Readings were much appreciated, and Mr. Andrews' visit has been a stimulus. C.

A ten days' mission has been conducted at Loftus by Rev. John Jameson. On Sundays the building was crowded, and on week nights there were very large gatherings, a pleasing feature being the attendance of many non-church or chapel goers. God has been glorified in the preaching of the Word, and there were many seekers.

In connection with the mission which has been held in connection with the Parish Church, St. Helens, the Vicar, Canon Willink, entertained the publicans of the town to dinner, and addresses were delivered by the Canon and the missioners. Canon Willink had already entertained the tramway workers, cabmen, and members of the police force respectively.

A mission has been held at the Baptist Chapel, Amersham, by Rev. W. H. Collins. Earnest addresses were delivered, and solos were sung by the evangelist. Efforts were made to gather in the unsaved by holding open-air meetings before the service each evening. There were a number of cases of inquiry, including several from the Sunday school. The meetings also proved stimulating to Christians.

A very encouraging mission has been held in Wakefield by Rev. Dr. Barrett, of Norwich. The churches united with much heartiness, and from Saturday to Thursday, November 17-22, meetings were held daily in Zion Congregational Church. In the afternoon, there were Bible readings, and in the evening larger gatherings. Deep interest was aroused among all classes, and an encouraging number of young men and women were among those that took a stand for the Gospel and the Christian life. Mr. W. R. Lane followed up the work.

Rev. F. C. Spurr, missioner of the Baptist Union, has conducted a ten days' mission at Sutton-in-Craven, Yorks. His addresses, which were characterized by forcible reasoning, apt illustration, earnest appeal, and spiritual power, attracted large audiences, in spite of unfavourable weather, and many were led to decision for Christ. In the afternoons, Mr. Spurr conducted Bible Readings on various phases of the Christian life, which proved most helpful, and resulted in the deepening of the spiritual life of the Church. At the close of the mission, he delivered his interesting lecture on "In Palestine and Moab."

F. W. Pollard, Pastor.

Obituary.

Rev. John Jeffery.

THE death is announced of Rev. John Jeffery, Baptist Missionary on the Congo, who passed away on November 9, at the early age of twenty-seven, while resting in this country. Mr. Jeffery was a worker of conspicuous devotion. He did not labour long in Congo land, but long enough to see some fruits of his toil, and to endear himself to many hearts. He made special study of some of the diseases from which the natives suffer, and was skilful in affording relief. He had a strong desire, if spared, to take a medical course and graduate at some university before returning to the Congo. Last summer Mr. Jeffery had worked hard at a previously unmastered native language, and had so far succeeded in reducing it to writing as to prepare large parts of it for publication in dictionary form.

Rev. J. Aldis.

Rev. J. Aldis, the doyen of the Baptist ministry, has passed away at the age of ninety-two. Mr. Aldis received all his schooling at a British school before he was twelve, and taught himself Greek and Latin after he had joined his father at the cobbler's bench. His promise attracted the attention of the pastor of the church with which he became associated, and he was sent to Horton College (afterward situate at Rawdon), then under Dr. Steadman, whose daughter, Miss Lavinia Steadman, subsequently became Mrs. Aldis. Their children achieved great distinction in their university careers.

M. J. Claveau, Paris.

The London secretary of the Paris City Mission recently received news of the death, under painful circumstances, of Monsieur Claveau, a promising ex-Roman Catholic priest, whose services were engaged by the mission in June, 1899. While cycling on his return from a Gospel meeting at Suresnes, he was knocked down by a runaway horse, and shockingly injured. Congestion of the lungs supervened, and he never recovered. From the time of his joining the mission he had combined evangelistic work with his theological studies, and had given promise of becoming a useful and devoted preacher of the Gospel. Under his charge the services at the Evangelical Conference Hall, Rue Clairaut, Paris, and the Sunday and Thursday schools had been attended with much blessing. In addition to conducting Divine worship and holding conferences, he carried on an extensive system of visitation. This faithful servant of Christ had proved himself a true convert from Romanism to Christian discipleship, and his experience and testimony as an agent of the Paris City Mission had rejoiced Protestants in the French capital, and awakened in the hearts of many Romish priests a spirit of inquiry and prayerful study of God's Word.

Notes & Comments

THE Free Church Manifesto, which we reproduce on page 11, is a document calculated to interest Christians of all Evangelical churches. It emphasizes the truths which must lie at the foundation of Gospel preaching, and it addresses the federated churches in a spirit which indicates sincere loyalty to the Lord Jesus Christ. We pray that the same spirit may dominate the entire enterprise ; and that the New Century may be ushered in with a great Revival throughout our land and the world at large.

During recent weeks we have been placing before our readers articles and studies on practical Evangelism. This week we give a striking paper, by Rev. James Mursell, on "Andrew, the Soul Winner" (p. 11). To those who hope to assist in the coming Mission—or in any missions, for that matter—we cordially commend a perusal of the article. We would suggest, as the probable key to Andrew's history, the fact that he had been with Jesus where He dwelt (John i. 35-42). It is said that we never know anyone until we have been in his home. There Andrew gained an intimacy with his Lord, which incited and enabled him to win his brother, and which also explains why it was he who told Jesus about the lad with the cakes and fishes, and why, when the Greeks would see Jesus, Philip told Andrew, and Andrew and Philip told Jesus. May many Andrews and Philips be brought to light during the Simultaneous Mission !

Our Two-Version Bible Scheme continues to engage an interest which we very highly appreciate. We trust many of our readers will do us the service which will entitle them to a copy of this most useful edition of the Sacred Scriptures. Those who have examined the book are unanimous in praising it. Mr. Ira D. Sankey writes :—

I have examined the Two-Version Bible, and am delighted with it. Here we have the familiar words and phrases of the Authorised Version, combined with the precious gleams of light and explanatory renderings and readings furnished by the Revised Version. The volume is easy to use, and cannot but prove of great service to Christian workers.

A Congregational minister also writes :—

The Two-Version Bible is a gem.

A correspondent at Hawick, N.B., who had been a reader of The Christian for a number of years, went heartily to work among his fellow Christian Endeavourers, and secured twelve more subscribers. He forwarded the subscriptions in due course, and the Two-Version Bible was sent to him. He writes :—

I have received your handsome gift. I cannot express in words how pleased I am. I have been showing the Bible to my friends, and I have no doubt some of them will try for a copy.

For many years past we have been giving occasional devotional articles from the pen of Mrs. Campbell, of Inchmarlo, Banchory, N.B., and from time to time requests have come for the re-publication of these choice compositions. It is a great pleasure to announce that Mrs. Campbell has at length collected twenty-one of them in a choice little volume : Music from the Harps of God : For the Solace of the Sorrowful. (1s. Morgan & Scott.) As Mr. Gray C. Fraser (Aberdeen) points out in the preface, the pages bear clear impress that the writer has personally experienced that the Master afflicteth not willingly. Mr. B. J. Willats, in an appreciation, testifies to signal blessing received from reading one of the papers years ago in our columns. He says :

I shall never cease to feel my indebtedness to the writer. Under God, these articles contributed very largely to heal the broken heart, and to bind up its wounds.

Nothing more needs to be said, except that the readings are veritable gems of spiritual light and beauty.

We much regret to hear that Dr. Harry Guinness has unfortunately been laid low with typhoid fever. The prayers of our readers are earnestly asked for his speedy and complete recovery. Dr. Guinness had just returned from a most encouraging evangelistic tour in Ireland, extending over six weeks, in the course of which he visited Dublin, Cork, Limerick and Waterford, and hundreds of souls received blessing.

A recent proposal made in The Times, that we should have "a national thanksgiving and commemoration of the century's prosperities and mercies, and dangers and deliverances," is worthy of adoption. We are too apt to forget both dangers and deliverances when they are behind us, and our mercies are so multiplied to us that we cease to enumerate them. Why should there not be as in America an annual Thanksgiving Day ? Only a week ago this solemn festival was kept by Americans, not only in their native land, but also by the scattered communities and travellers throughout Europe, and in many of these places the English took the opportunity of joining with them in thanksgiving and praise.

Mr. Arthur Sherwell, joint author of the remarkable book on Temperance Reform that has recently so startled and impressed the country, is just back from a visit to the Australian Colonies, and has given his impressions on the effect of an absence of any form of Established religion in those Colonies and in New Zealand. His opinion without qualification is eminently favourable. He says :—

In the case of the Free Churches, it cannot be questioned that it greatly enhances their social usefulness, and gives them what I may be allowed without offence to call a more courageous self-respect. This is especially noticeable in small communities. In the case of the Anglican Church itself, as it exists in the Colonies, I believe the absence of State ties has an admirable effect in quickening its social activity, and in inspiring a more vital and practical interest in civic and social life.

What an advance would be made in religion and morality, and in the material well-being of the nation, if only the Legislature could be influenced to follow the noble example just set by the Manx Parliament in dealing drastically with the drink question ! The House of Keys, in the Isle of Man, has just passed a Licensing Act, which not only curtails the hours during which intoxicants may be sold, and extends the Sunday traveller limit, but also excludes from licensing benches all persons connected, in even the most distant manner, with the traffic. The measure also sweeps away the grocers' licence, and increases largely the licence duties. Is it not lamentable that in England the Administration should be afraid to make any effort to curtail the evil influence of the brewer, the distiller, and the publican, and that it should be left to one of the smallest of our islands to lead the way in the direction of righteousness ?

Is it too much to hope that the new Parliament will do something in regard to the frightful amount of betting throughout the country ? It has recently been stated authoritatively that there are no fewer than 5,000 professional bookmakers daily engaged in their injurious trade, and that their regular clients exceed half a million ; and when it is remembered that every town has its betting clubs, some idea may be formed of the extent of the evil and of the amount of misery resulting from it. Such a state of things calls loudly for repressive measures, the existing Acts being manifestly insufficient to produce the effect they were intended to have.

The Stage-Censor, in awaking from a long period of masterly inactivity, has interdicted a play based on the Scriptural story of Joseph, written, we believe, by a Sydney clergyman. This he has done, not on the ground of questionable moral influence, but simply on the ground of its Scriptural basis. This solitary act on the part of the Censor of Plays has of course been met by a vigorous protest from speakers at the Playgoers' Club. The Press as a whole, however, has practically endorsed it. Whatever lengths of laxity may be permitted to secular plays in their professed attempt to be true to "life," the British public is not likely to tolerate any invasion of the Sacred Book to provide material for pleasing the mixed multitudes that attend our places of amusement, and filling the coffers of theatrical speculators. There is a deep instinct against the representation of sacred subjects, and the impersonation of sacred characters on the mimic stage of the drama. They belong to worship, not to art, and would soon be desecrated by contact with the theatre as it is, and as it is likely to be.

An account of the work done by the Central Ireland (Methodist) Mission furnishes interesting reading. This mission is almost unique in that is has no buildings and seeks none. It is a purely open-air effort for the purpose of proclaiming the Gospel at the fairs and markets in the central districts of the island. The methods of the missioners exclude all attacks on existing religious agencies, which enables them to preach positive Christian truth to much larger numbers than would otherwise be reachable. In many cases "crowds of eager listeners have hung on the preacher's words, sometimes moved to tears, and manifestly responsive to his appeals." On the whole, the plan of campaign has saved the missioners from hostile attack and misrepresentation, and enabled them to reach many who might be otherwise inaccessible. Our Methodist brethren are reaping the benefit of the labours of other open-air pioneers. One soweth and another reapeth. God bless them all.

There is one element in the discussions proceeding concerning the decline in Sunday-school attendance that must not be allowed to pass without the most serious consideration, and that is, the employment of unspiritual persons in the work of teaching. In certain Northern towns we have heard of quite a number of teachers who make no personal profession of faith in Christ, and yet these are allowed and even invited to teach the young. The effect of such teaching cannot be other than disastrous. Unconverted teachers are a menace to the true work of the Sunday school.

The time seems to have arrived when the whole question of Sunday-school work needs reconsidering. Two points call for especial consideration: The quality of the teachers, and the quality of the teaching. The most competent workers obtainable are required for the delicate task of training the young. Only the most skilful gardeners are entrusted with the work of caring for tender plants, and surely young children's lives need the greatest watchfulness. The infant class needs, not merely nice teachers who can keep the children quiet, but teachers who have the God-given art of training even the youngest in the fear of the Lord. A teacher needs to live very near to God, if his or her work is to succeed. In view of the terrible chasm between the school and the church, there is imperative need for a rigorous inquiry into the whole system of Sunday-school work.

The unwise passion for young preachers, shown in so many churches, is having the effect of greatly shortening the period of usefulness in the ministry, as many a pastor finds to his cost when nearing fifty years of age. At that time, in most cases, the powers are riper, the experience richer, and the heart more fully persuaded of its faith than is possible earlier in life. But the general preference for young men in the important positions in life is invading the pulpit, and many churches altogether decline to hear any candidate for their pastorate who has passed the rubicon of forty years. A contemporary prints a letter from a minister who had resigned his pastorate after twenty years of good service, under the impression that another man might henceforth do better work in that particular church. When seeking another sphere of labour, however, he found that his age (fifty) was an apparently insuperable barrier to an invitation, though in good health, in better preaching form than ten years ago, and full of joy in the work. These are facts for devout consideration by the leaders in the churches.

The doom of preaching as a factor in religious and national life has often been sounded since Carlyle's time, but as Canon Hensley Henson said, in a lecture at the Working Men's College on the "History of Preaching," while preaching will probably never again have the political and national importance that it had in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, owing to the great development of journalism and the publication of books, it must ever retain its supreme place in the ministrations of religion. Christ ordained it as the appointed means for the propagation of his truth and the conversion of sinners. His Gospel is a personal appeal from God to man, and it will retain that personal element only so long as it is delivered straight from heart to heart and mouth to mouth. Books and religious periodicals can do an incalculable service to religion, but they cannot take the place of the man who, with the love of God burning in his heart, and the Divine message of pardon trembling on his lips, appeals to men as Christ's ambassador, and beseeches them "in his stead" to become reconciled to God "as dear children."

In referring to a statement recently made by Canon Henson that—

> The best and most intellectual work of thinkers and teachers is not now to be found in records of pulpit deliverances, but in books and newspapers.

A somewhat freethinking contemporary, by no means given to extolling the pulpit, remarks that, if it were true, "even they who are most conscious of the defects of the pulpit, would regret it," and goes on to add that the novelist and the journalist are the last persons to whom they would wish to see the power of the preacher transferred. Naturally, the writer urges that, to make the pulpit powerful in the future, the preacher should become more imbued with "humanitarianism;" but does it not go without saying that all great preaching is influenced by that feeling, for if the preacher love not his brother whom he hath seen, how shall he love God whom he hath not seen?

A minister, speaking to his congregation a Sunday or two ago, complained of the impression given to him that most of those present had come to church expecting to be lifted up into a spiritual frame of mind entirely by the efforts of the preacher, rather than by any contributory efforts of their own; so that it was not till the sermon arrived that they seem to have come into a true worshipping mood. He exhorted them to come prepared in mind and heart, so that the praise and the prayers might strike a helpful devotional note from the beginning. It is probable that there is a widespread tendency among Nonconformist congregations to expect their ministers to bring the fuel as well as to light the spark of worship. This accounts for the formality and lukewarmness of many a religious "service." The old hymn would suit the case of not a few city and suburban churches—

> Awake, ye saints, arise! too long
> In heaviness ye sing.
> 'Tis time to raise a gladlier song,
> And strike a loftier string.

When the silence that has succeeded to the publicity of the Armenian atrocities is broken, it is to reveal a state of things that is ominous of future trouble in the East. A letter from Bitlis tells us plainly that to the horrors of massacre have succeeded the slow agony of pitiless, commercial, social, and religious oppression. The Kurds are once more in evidence. Detachments of mounted troops scour the village districts ostensibly to collect taxes, but really to subsist on the population, and to help themselves to all they can get. Agriculturists in straits for money are forced to mortgage their farms at an exorbitant rate, which means that presently they lose them altogether. Forced labour is demanded to build mosques, post offices, and public buildings, materials as well being occasionally demanded from the Christian natives. The conditions are so hard that many are abjuring the Christian faith for Mohammedanism, many of these being women who escape worse treatment than death by these means. The United States is the only country at present showing a firm attitude towards the Sultan.

Speaking at a recent meeting at Exeter Hall, Mrs. Bishop, than whom perhaps no one is better qualified to speak upon Eastern matters, said that during the first years of her travels she cared nothing for missions, but she had been converted from that attitude by seeing the awful need there was for such work.

> The conclusion was forced upon one that these Asiatic systems had no power of regeneration from within, that the populous countries which they dominated must be regenerated from without, and that the only thing which can raise these peoples is Christianity received as a vital force.

Referring specially to China, she added that she would say unhesitatingly that—

> The raw material out of which the Holy Ghost fashions the Chinese convert and Chinese martyr is the best stuff in Asia. . . . It was always the case that the Chinese convert became the missionary, and the Gospel which would yet become the vital force of China would be spread by native Christian converts. Their liberality and self-denial for Christian purposes were extraordinary, and their eager study of the Bible put us to shame.

Sir Charles Elliott, K.C.S.I., has made a statement from which it appears that whereas, according to the first general census of India, the number of native Christians in that country in 1871 was only 1,270,000, in 1881 the figures had risen to 1,600,000, and in 1891 to over 2,000,000. As the great mass of converts belong to the aboriginal tribes, whose animistic religion rests entirely on the basis of fear, the doctrine of a God of love has for them great novelty, if not peculiar charm. Those of the Aryan races, said Sir Charles, "had in almost every case come through much tribulation into the kingdom of God." Looking at these figures, and the probability of the increase going on by arithmetical progression, we reach the solid basis for Lord Lawrence's assertion that, "notwithstanding all that the English race had done for India, the missionaries have done more than all other agencies put together."

A week or two ago we remarked upon the imperative need for the improvement of village life, so that the rush to overcrowded towns and cities may be avoided. It is now pointed out to us that in parts of Yorkshire the village problem is largely solved. Industries flourish in very many villages, and it is no uncommon thing for several generations of people to remain in one place employed in one industry. Often the physical surroundings are very beautiful; the air is pure, and we learn that crime is generally at a minimum. This bears out our contention that the hope for the future in industrial matters lies in utilising the villages. Already several large London firms have removed their works into the country, finding it in every way cheaper and better so to do. What is wanted is the extension of this movement, so that the congestion of large cities may be prevented, and thus one great source of crime be removed.

It appears from a very interesting paper by Mrs. Fisher in one of our contemporaries that the work of the Peabody Trust has been productive of the best results in several directions. The latest report, that for the year before last, shows that up to that date the trustees had provided healthy accommodation for no fewer than 19,562 persons, the average rent of each dwelling being only 4s. 9d. per week, and of each single room 2s. 2d. The value of such housing is perhaps best illustrated by the fact that the average weekly earnings of each head of a family occupying rooms is but twenty-three shillings. In the Peabody Buildings both the death rate and the infant mortality rate, "which is justly regarded as the most significant," are below that of all London. It is difficult to grasp the full meaning of these figures in their bearing upon morality and religion, yet there are people who decry the praiseworthy efforts of such philanthropists as Peabody and others.

A Free Church Manifesto.

SIMULTANEOUS MISSION, 1901.

THE following Declaration was made by the Committee of the Free Church Council, in session at Leeds last week:—

The Committee of the National Council of the Evangelical Free Churches, at this its last meeting of the century, reaffirms its profound conviction that the Churches have been impelled by the Divine Spirit to seek that full union and co-operation which the Council was called into being to promote; and expresses its heartfelt gratitude for the guidance of the Lord Jesus Christ, the Head of the Church, in what the Council has been enabled to do.

The Committee is impressed with the solemnity of the work which lies before the Council in the Twentieth Century Simultaneous Mission; and sends an affectionate greeting to the Churches which are taking part in it.

The Mission is intended to be a great effort to bring home the reality of the Gospel to the multitude of the English people, for whose salvation God is putting an urgent desire into his servants' hearts.

Pre-eminently the Mission must be a preaching of the Gospel.

The doctrine of the Deity of Jesus Christ, the Saviour of the world, involves both his Divine authority to forgive sins, and his Divine grace in saving; and the faith of this will make the efforts of the Churches powerful and tender.

The greatness of Christ's sacrifice, and the reality of his Atonement for the sins of the whole world, will prove again an appeal to which the hearts and conscience of quickened sinners will respond.

The Committee recalls the fact that habitual reliance on the inspiration and help of the Holy Spirit was a conspicuous note of the Evangelical Revival of the Eighteenth Century; and feels earnestly the need of the same reliance on the part of the Churches engaging in the Mission. The wisdom, and tenderness, and faith, which are required to deal with human souls in all varieties of spiritual want, can only be supplied by the Holy Ghost, the Comforter, whom the living Lord of the Churches still sends forth to inspire and sustain His people, as well as to convince the world of sin, of righteousness, and of judgment.

It is with a full heart that the Committee thus addresses the Federated Churches. It commends them affectionately to God for the supply of all their needs; and urges them to pray much for themselves and one another, that larger blessings than we can ask or think may result from their simultaneous endeavour.

Signed by order of the Committee, given December 8, 1900.

Irish Society.—In connection with its evangelistic and pastoral aid work in Ireland, this Society has inaugurated a somewhat unique and interesting system of colportage. Two vans have been constructed, not only to carry a large consignment of Bibles, Testaments, and carefully selected religious books, but to afford sleeping accommodation to the evangelists in charge, thus enabling them to visit and stay awhile in out-of-the-way places where no lodgings could be found. Taking their temporary home with them, they can make it a centre of colportage work and missionary influence in the most remote and least accessible parts of Ireland. Within three months no fewer than 671 Roman Catholic families were visited; sixty-six Bibles and Testaments, 157 Scripture texts, and 256 religious books were sold; while at fairs and markets, and in wayside glens, the Story of Peace had many listeners.

Andrew, the Soul-Winner.

BY REV. JAMES MURSELL.

ANDREW was an ordinary man. He stands connected with no great event; he never said anything original; he wrote no book of Holy Scripture; his personality does not command attention; he was known as "Simon Peter's brother." The shadow of a more commanding nature eclipsed him; yet he did a useful and a blessed work, and it is evident to anyone who looks beneath the surface of the Gospel narrative, that he had a place of his own in the apostolic band.

We have three glimpses of the man, all in the Gospel of St. John. The first is when, having followed Jesus, and having been a little while with Him, he breaks in upon Simon, saying, "I have found the Christ." The second is on the memorable day on which the Lord fed the five thousand; Andrew's thoughtful eye had noticed the lad with the wallet on his back, and when the need arises he looks round for him, and brings the boy to Jesus. The little chap is shy, but Andrew leads him kindly to the Lord and says, "Here is a boy with a few cakes, and a fish or two."

The last peep that we have of Andrew is when the Greeks desire to see Jesus; they come to Philip first, but for some reason or another "Philip cometh and telleth Andrew, and Andrew and Philip tell Jesus." On each of these occasions Andrew is doing one and the same thing, bringing people to the Lord; first his brother, then the boy with the barley cakes, then the Greeks of the feast. I fancy that if, instead of three glimpses of him, we had thirty, it would be much the same; he sets before us

A BEAUTIFUL EXAMPLE OF SOUL-WINNING.

If Peter is known among the Apostles as the preacher and spokesman, and John as the disciple whom Jesus loved, Andrew should be remembered as the soul-winner.

The first thing that strikes one about these peeps at Andrew is that he began the work of soul-winning right at the beginning of his Christian life, and kept on at it to the end. He did not potter about, waiting for the Lord or someone else to tell him what to do; he let his own heart speak. It said, "Go and tell Simon," and he went and told him. That is what many a young Christian's heart says. "Tell your brother; tell your chum;" but they do not tell him. They say, "I can't." Then years afterwards they come to their minister and say, "I can't pray at the prayer-meeting; I can't speak to people about spiritual things; I can't do this, or that." Why not? Because they did not begin at the beginning. They stifled the voice, and they quenched the Spirit that spoke in their hearts when love to Christ was young. So, instead of developing ability, they developed inability; they are good at figures, like Philip; they can keep a minute-book, or arrange for a tea-meeting; but when anyone comes to them and says, "Sir, we would see Jesus," they are helpless. They cannot do that sort of thing; they look about for Andrew, or the minister.

To do spiritual work we must begin where Andrew did, at the beginning, and keep on at it to the end. He was perhaps rather abrupt with Simon; but he was more skilful with the boy, and by the time the Greeks sought Jesus in the temple he had developed such tact and delicacy as to have won a reputation among the twelve for a happy faculty for introducing people to the Lord. Some people never blunder, because they never begin; the blunder of a loving heart is infinitely better than the faultlessness of the critic who has not enough love to make a mistake. God give us more blunderers like Andrew; they may never grow into Peters who preach sermons which convert thousands, but they develop a gift of drawing the ones and the twos to Christ.

If Andrew could not stir the multitude, he could win the individual; he went on adding one to one; his hundred was soon hit. Some people do not believe in personal dealing; but Christ our Lord and Saviour does. It is of such as Andrew that He says, "They that be wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament; and they that turn many to righteousness as the stars for ever and ever."

Another thing that strikes one about Andrew is that, although he never did anything great on his own account, the little that he did invariably led to much. He could not speak words to live in human hearts for ever, but he could give the Master opportunity for doing so. It was because he brought the Greeks to Christ that words were spoken which have turned more to God than Peter's sermon on the day of Pentecost:—"I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all unto Me." Andrew could not work miracles to feed five thousand men, but he could bring to Christ the lad whose loaves and fishes gave Him the opening He sought for showing forth the mighty power of God. Andrew was not a man of rock, such as Christ needed for the formation of his Church, but he could bring the man to Him who had the necessary granite in him. Next to being great must surely rank the privilege of drawing mighty souls to God. Here the

LEAST MAY INFLUENCE THE GREATEST.

Plain Ananias of Damascus may lead Saul of Tarsus to the light; a lowly monk may guide the troubled soul of a young Luther into peaceful trust in the forgiveness of sins; a local preacher may be the instrument of the conversion of a Spurgeon; a Sunday-school teacher may speak the word that wins a Moody to become a mighty weapon in the hand of God: all of them one-talent men, only good and faithful like Andrew; each doing the little that he can, stirring up the gift of faith and love that is withheld from none, and using it for God. Everyone can do that; a little taper may light a great fire and flicker out, content so that the fire burns on.

> The least flower with a brimming cup,
> May share its dewdrop with another near;

and if that other is a bloom whose fragrance fills the world with joy, so much the better.

I am so glad that the Saviour had a place for Andrew among the glorious company of the Apostles. I faint before the lightning that flames upon the face of John. Peter's passion of love and daring discourages my fearfulness and little faith; but Andrew comforts me and encourages me, and makes me hope that even I, perhaps, may be a vessel meet for the Master's use. It is such a blessing to find that a man who never had an original thought was of some use in the world. Some people's originality is all in their thoughts; if Andrew had any, it was in his deeds. He had no flash of insight, but he did the little that he saw, and being faithful in little, without knowing it, he was faithful in much. He was the first to win a life for Christ, and that life was his brother's; he was the first to bring a child to Him, so stands for ever the exemplar of Sunday-school teachers, and all who work among the young. He was the first to introduce the Gentiles to the King of nations, and so in some sense anticipated both Peter and Paul.

Andrew was a commonplace Christian, but he did not go to heaven alone. He stood in Peter's congregation on the day of Pentecost, and looked out for the tell-tale faces that bespoke hearts pierced by the word of truth, and then lovingly led them one by one to the great Physician. When he began to preach upon his own account he was not popular, but people understood what he meant; he was plain and practical, and very personal; his finger always pointed Christwards. In his sermons as well as in his private conversation he was always introducing people to Christ; you never talked about Andrew afterwards, but of Jesus; his favourite text was in the words the Master spoke the day he brought the Greeks to Him: "He that loveth his life shall lose it, and he that hateth his life in this world shall keep it unto life eternal." On these stern words did Andrew speak so tenderly, and lovingly, and convincingly that, before they knew it, his hearers found themselves loving Christ instead of their own lives, unto the death. So he went on his way, and as he climbed the hill up to the city gates, a great multitude of the spirits of the just made perfect crowded out to meet him, insomuch that the keeper of the gate marvelled and said, "What mighty man is this?" and they replied, "This is no mighty man, but only he who led us to the Lord. This is Andrew, Simon Peter's brother."

Evangelistic Zeal.

"Fervent in spirit, serving the Lord" (Rom. xii. 11).

"Give me children, or I die!"
Once was heard a piercing cry!
Would such zeal my heart could know,
As in winning souls I go.

"Give me converts, or I die!"
Would that thus my heart would cry;
Travailing thus for souls in birth—
Souls of matchless, wondrous worth!

Listening to my Lord's appeal,
Clothed as with consuming zeal,
As, with voice aloud I cry—
"Loved ones, turn to Christ, or—die!

Oh! my listlessness I mourn,
Saviour, Lord, to Thee I turn;
Chide my coldness, fire my soul
With a zeal unquenchable!

Through each nerve of mine infuse
Fervour for the heavenly news,
That the lost might hear the call,
And God's saving power extol.

Thus, as with a tongue of flame,
Might I spread abroad thy name;
And, be this my constant cry—
"Give me converts, or I die!"

Protestant Reformation Society. — On Thursday evening, Mr. W. H. Fison presided over a large meeting of the Welcome Mission, Portsmouth, and was supported by Rev. T. Lindsay Young, vicar of St. John's, Portsea, Mr. Hogben, and other leading Protestant friends. A lantern lecture was given by Mr. Limbrick on "The Causes and Preludes of the Reformation." A systematic endeavour to educate the people in English Church history will be followed in the district. Mr. Lindsay delivered a speech, in the course of which he challenged various statements advanced by the vicar of Portsea in praise of Archbishop Laud.

The late Hester Needham.—Rev. G. R. Thornton, vicar of S. Barnabas, Kensington, writes: "It has been proposed that a copy of 'God First: or Hester Needham's Work in Sumatra,' should be sent as a present to lady missionaries abroad. There are 300 copies remaining of the present (first) edition, and the Religious Tract Society will sell them at half price, 1s. 9d., if they are all taken and used for this purpose. To carry out this proposal, twenty-five guineas would be required. Communications should be addressed to Miss Enfield, 6, Park Valley, Nottingham (cousin of Miss Needham), who would also be glad to know names of missionaries to whom donors might elect to have copies sent.

Elisha, the Prophet of Vision.

VIII.—The Mistake of a Great Man

(2 Kings v.).

By Rev. F. S. WEBSTER, M.A.*

THE whole Gospel is in this chapter. No Old Testament story perhaps is better adapted to explain the way of salvation and illustrate the difficulties souls meet in their search for peace and spiritual healing.

We have already noticed the impression Elisha had made upon the little maid. Her vivid faith, her confident assurance, were entirely due to Elisha's vision of God and his faithful use of "the shut door" and "the double portion." The healing of Naaman is carried through in the same way. Elisha does all his work within his own home. He keeps himself out of sight, and never sees Naaman until after his recovery. There is a knowledge of men and affairs which is learnt from frequent intercourse with the world. There is a which is only gained by the teaching of God's Spirit. It is a chief source of spiritual influence. Notice then—

(1) The Consternation in the King's Court.—"Elisha heard that the King had rent his robes." This was his first intimation probably of the errand of Naaman. The little maid's testimony seems to have been carried to the highest quarter in Syria, for the King himself was made acquainted with it. "His lord," in verse 4, means probably the King of Syria. Perhaps Naaman was too hopeless to give any heed to what the maid had said. But the King determined to carry the matter through. So he sent Naaman with his own autograph letter to the King of Samaria. It caused consternation in the palace. He was asking what seemed as impossible as the raising of the dead. Surely he was only seeking a "casus belli." No one in the palace remembered Elisha. The little captive maid had more faith than any about the King's person. So Naaman meets with a hopeless rebuff. In former years he had marched at the head of his conquering legions; now he crawls up to the palace—a needy, helpless suppliant. His leprosy had been advertised to the whole Court of Samaria, and

NO ONE COULD SUGGEST A REMEDY.

(2) The Confidence of the Prophet's Message.—But Elisha had learned God's mind about it. Naaman, the Gentile, Israel's victorious foe, was not to seek in vain. God was about to heal him. So the message came—"Let him come now to me, and he shall know that there is a prophet in Israel." His confidence seems almost boastful. The pitiable impotence of the court which had lost touch with God had roused the indignation of the prophet.

The message contains a truth which never changes. Secular governments cannot deal with the worst ills of a nation; no power they exercise can heal the most serious distempers of society. The king needs the prophet. The State needs the Church of Christ. Notice, the prophet remains in the background, and only sends a message. The exercise of supernatural or spiritual gifts is often the occasion of severe spiritual temptations. The thought of the reputation to be acquired by the healing of Naaman was no doubt presented to Elisha. What an opportunity for a dramatic display equalling Elijah's triumph on Carmel! Let him appear in the midst of the despairing court, and there, in the King's presence, manifest the supreme power of the prophet whom they had forgotten or ignored. But Elisha was proof against all such temptations. For the honour of God the "me" was prominent in his message; but for the good of Naaman, the prophet himself was alone and prostrate before God.

(3) The Consecration of Elisha's whole Conduct.—The same consecration and denial of self are seen in all his treatment of Naaman. Without it Naaman would never have received his double cure. The prophet's first message, though full of encouragement, was distinctly trying to his pride. "Why does he not come to me?" the proud man thought. "Perhaps he is afraid to heal me here, lest the king might want to share the fee. Cunning fellow, he means to have all the profit." So Naaman laughs in his sleeve, as he thinks how readily Elisha will come out and perform his incantations when he gets the distinguished patient all to himself. Naaman's pride and confidence in his wealth and high position must be broken. He must learn that the servants of God are that in God's sight he is only a leper, not fit to be touched. The means used for his recovery must be such as will teach Naaman that the healing comes not from the prophet, but from God. So Gehazi brings him another message with a definite promise attached: "Go and wash in Jordan seven times, and thy flesh shall come again to thee, and thou shalt be clean."

It was a sharp test. He had driven his chariot through the fords of Jordan, and had gazed contemptuously on its muddy waters, so insignificant did they seem after the noble rivers of Damascus. It awakened all his patriotic prejudice and the pride of the conqueror of Palestine. If mere water could have healed him, he would have had no cause to leave his own beautiful city. Trials would be no trials if we understood why they were sent. It is when reason fails to understand the meaning of the command that faith is most shown in obeying it. To rely simply upon the precious Blood, which cleanseth from all sin, takes more faith than to trust to "works of righteousness which we have done." It is natural to trust to the Abana and Pharpar of intellectual training and moral culture. It needs grace and a broken and contrite heart to "wash and be clean." The "hard thing" we are glad to do: it soothes our pride, it makes us joint authors of our salvation. The washing in the Blood of Jesus we stumble over; it leaves

NO FOOTHOLD FOR SELF-RIGHTEOUSNESS.

But Naaman returns from Jordan, perfectly healed, full of faith in God and gratitude to Elisha. So this time the prophet sees him. Naaman wants to make a thank-offering. "Take a blessing of thy servant." But Elisha refused. He wanted to keep Naaman's eyes fixed on God. To God alone must the gratitude, offering be given. He nobly foregoes the offered portion of "this world's good," lest Naaman's sense of gratitude, and debt to God for the higher good which he had received, should, in any way, be lessened or impaired.

He returns to his chamber, and to intercourse with God. There a strange, sad vision comes before him and disturbs his communion. He sees Naaman's chariot stopping, and Gehazi running up to receive the coveted treasure. You know the sad sequel. Those who covet the world's treasure generally have to share the world's uncleanness. But if the eye be single, the vision will be clear, and within the shut door the man of God learns how to educate the faith of the blundering seeker, and how to detect the hypocrite.

* Notes of an address in All Souls', Langham Place, on Friday morning, November 30.

"Peter's Pence."—The Italian journal, The Nazione, states that the amount of "Peter's Pence" brought to the Pope during this year up to September last amounted to £320,000, no less than £52,000 having been presented in the month of May alone. Beyond this further amounts of £520,000 were handed to him personally, and also many valuable jewels and works of art. Yet we still continue to meet with references to the "poor prisoner" of the Vatican!

Systematic Prayer.—Mr. William C. Irvine, of Jejuri, India, makes the suggestion that lists of persons for whom daily prayer is made, should be divided as follows:—(1) Those in whom we are greatly interested, who are not saved. You cannot pray for the unconverted, and do nothing towards bringing them into the light. (2) Those among our own acquaintances who have backslidden. You cannot pray for backsliders, and be one yourself. (3) Those we personally know who are in active service. You cannot pray for the workers, and remain idle. (4) Those formerly in list (1) and (2), who are now saved or restored. You cannot pray without praise.

The Late Rev. C. A. Fox.

WITH deep sorrow we announce the death of Rev. Charles Armstrong Fox, B.A., for twenty-five years incumbent of Eaton Chapel, S.W. As our readers have from time to time been made aware, Mr. Fox has for some months past been prostrate through painful illness, involving surgical operations and great physical strain.

From his sick chamber he has sent forth messages of peace and comfort as in years gone by. Only a few months since we printed his verses entitled, "The Supreme Attraction," full of tenderness, and anticipating his joyful departure. We reproduce this fragrant poem, gaining as it does fresh force and depth of meaning under the circumstances of its author's peaceful death :—

"Marred more than any man's," yet there's no place
In this wide universe but gains new grace,
Richer and fuller, from that marrèd Face!

O Saviour Christ, those precious wounds of thine
Make doubly precious these poor wounds of mine;
Teach me to die with Thee the death divine!

All wounds and woes of flesh, once made thine own,
Add colour to the rainbow round the throne,
And save from loneliness saints else alone.

Belovèd ones are hurrying in, and all
The ground is strewn with blossoms they let fall,
In haste to enter life's high festival.

Heaven beckons me, I press me toward the mark
Of my high calling—hark, He calls, oh hark!
That wounded Face moves towards me through the dark.

On more than one important occasion the pen of Mr. Fox sang of victory over death and the grave. He wrote as follows, at the time of the sudden departure of the late Rev. G. H. C. Macgregor :

Brother, O my brother,
Though shadowed be our ranks,
The warrior-host of Jesus
Sends up a shout of thanks.

Thanks for thy noble witness,
Thanks for thy life's accord,
Thanks for thy saintly valour—
Heaven's dew upon thy sword.

Thanks for thy glorious battles,
Thy bugle blast, "Saints, higher!"
No marvel Christ hath caught thee
Home to his breast in fire!

In December last, when Mr. D. L. Moody went home, Mr. Fox was much crippled in eyesight, but he dictated a powerful poem, which appeared in our columns at the time. Mr. Fox bore up bravely and well, in the strength of his Lord, against severe physical trial, but, after a serious relapse, he passed away on Wednesday, December 5, aged 64.

THE FUNERAL SERVICE.

At the funeral service at Eaton Chapel, on Saturday last, a large congregation assembled, in spite of inclement weather, among those present being many prominent Evangelical workers. The officiating clergy were Revs. Prebendary H. W. Webb-Peploe, Evan H. Hopkins, E. W. Moore, and F. L. Meares for the past eleven years assistant minister at Eaton Chapel).

At the outset of a brief address, Rev. Evan H. Hopkins referred, with emotion, to the loss sustained by the congregation, and in a wider measure, by the Church at large, in the death of so saintly and well-beloved a man as Charles A. Fox. God had hallowed the character of his servant with Divine chastenings, and throughout a life marked by much suffering, he was full of restful peace and overflowing joy. A man of large heart, gifted with fine abilities and a rare poetic genius, he consecrated his all to his Lord's service. Perhaps his most prominent trait was his profound sympathy; he found peculiar joy in hearing of the prosperity of others.

Proceeding, Mr. Hopkins said the occasion should be one, not of gloom and darkness, but of thanksgiving, in thinking of our brother in the presence of his Master. He will be missed by his flock, and by Christian people generally, but chiefly by those who have heard his burning words, from time to time, at the Keswick Convention. Mr. Hopkins went on to read from some memoranda penned by one of those attending on Mr. Fox during his last days. Especially pathetic were those passages which described the utterances of Mr. Fox when imagining himself back among his congregation. "Good-night, my dear people," he had said with great emphasis, although it was an agony to him to speak. Soon afterwards, there had ensued another paroxysm of pain, and his voice was silent until he awoke in the presence of his Lord.

After a season of silent prayer, the service concluded with the singing of "The sands of time are sinking." The coffin was removed from its place in front of the Communion rail, and the funeral cortège proceeded to Brompton Cemetery. The district is a busy one, especially on a Saturday afternoon, but many tokens of respect on the part of the public were paid to the memory of our departed friend. Here and there, in the vicinity of Sloane Square, the pavements were lined with sympathizers as the solemn procession passed.

At the cemetery the choir led the assembly with the familiar words of "For ever with the Lord," sung in subdued tones and with deep feeling, as the coffin was borne to the grave. Then Prebendary Webb-Peploe pronounced the final, affecting words of the Office, and, as the gathering slowly dispersed, the friends who lingered sang, "Peace, perfect peace," an appropriate conclusion to a spiritual and touching service.

From photograph by Mr. G. P. Abrahams, Keswick.

FROM REV. F. B. MEYER.

"In perfect peace, at dawn of day," so the card ran which summoned us to the last sad obsequies," the Rev. Charles A. Fox, Pastor and Friend, deeply beloved, entered in to see his Lord and Master, 'face to face.'" That characterization was most accurate. He was a man "greatly beloved." And because so greatly loved, greatly chastened. Few have suffered more terribly than he did. It was through a baptism of fire that he passed to the presence of the King. As long as I have known him, for some fifteen years, he has been a sufferer; but his life of pain culminated in paroxysms of anguish.

Through it all, however, he was radiant. The Peace of God kept his soul, shone upon his face, and enabled him to interest himself so absolutely in his friends, that it seemed impossible to believe that his own sufferings were so severe. So far from being self-centred, full of complaints, or demanding the sympathy and help of others, he concealed his condition from all but the eyes that could not be turned aside, and appeared absolutely absorbed in the circumstances of the friend with whom he might be conversing.

One never spoke in his presence without his uttering some word of sympathy and appreciation—but without a suggestion of flattery or fulsome praise. He made you feel that he had been following the address with living sympathy and prayer. So often he would say, "Did it not strike you so and so?" In the most generous way, suggesting some fresh side of the truth, or throwing in some hint full of poetic beauty.

His addresses, and especially his prayers, were fragrant with the spirit of the beloved Apostle. He spoke as one who leaned on the bosom of Christ, and to whom Christ was more real and precious than the dearest earthly friend. Of him, as of Enoch, we may say "he walked with God." Dowered with a fine poetic genius, even death itself can make no break in the golden chain of thought and speech, which he was ever weaving. And in the heavenly temple, if a Heman or an Asaph is needed to make new songs, surely, amongst the bands of celestial poets, will be found this rare saint and heaven-taught singer, my friend and brother—Charles A. Fox.

"Now He is Comforted."

IN MEMORIAM, REV. CHARLES A. FOX.

AFTER a stormy day,
Sweet calm and rest!
The warrior is home,—
So long, so hardly press'd.
His now abundant life, joy evermore;
Manhood and strength renewed on that bright shore.
In perfect service, dwelling with the King,
In that unclouded vision worshipping,
While his glad song in rapture of delight
In free unfettered melody can wing its flight.
His faith the darkness challenged—found LOVE there,
And in the revelation strength to bear
All suffering. So He gently led Till, in his Home above, God comforted.

MARY E. MAXWELL.

Mr. Sankey's Meetings.

THE interest in Mr. Ira D. Sankey's meetings in this country was maintained to the close of his visit. At Bournemouth, Mr. and Mrs. Sankey were the guests of Dowager Countess Cairns, who attended all the meetings.

For the two gatherings which had been arranged for Friday last in the Shaftesbury Hall, all the tickets had been called for a week beforehand. In addition, therefore, to giving his lecture on "Singing through Egypt and Palestine," and the "Service of Sacred Song and Story," Mr. Sankey decided to give an extra service, free to all. There was again a very large attendance, and at the evangelistic service on Sunday afternoon the hall was crowded to the doors. On the latter occasion a thanksgiving offering was taken on behalf of Fanny Crosby, the blind hymn writer, which is to be presented to her on Christmas Day at her home in America.

During his visit to this country Mr. Sankey has been able to accept only thirty of the many invitations he received. He has given sixty addresses, but seems in better health and voice than when he arrived in September last.

After holding two crowded services at Southampton, Mr. Sankey sailed yesterday (Dec. 12) for New York, by the s.s. Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse. On his arrival home, Mr. Sankey hopes to finish his new book on "The Story of the Hymns," after which he will begin the work of his Training School for Gospel Singers.

Our readers may be glad to know that a new cabinet photograph of Mr. Sankey, the only one taken in this country for some twenty-five years, is now ready (price one shilling), and may be obtained at the office of this paper.

Noon Prayer Meeting.—At the noon meeting at Aldersgate Street Y.M.C.A., on Monday last, Rev. D. Macgregor, of Wimbledon, gave an address on "Lessons for Christian Workers from the Life of the late Rev. G. H. C. Macgregor." On the invitation of Mr. M. H. Hodder, who presided, Rev. Dr. J. Monro Gibson subsequently addressed the many workers who had rallied for the occasion. Dr. Gibson, after referring to the spirituality and devotion of G. H. C. Macgregor, spoke of blessing given in recent preparatory meetings for the forthcoming Simultaneous Mission, and made a stirring appeal for increased interest and faith in connection with the movement.

Other Lands.

South Africa General Mission.

THIS war has been instrumental in enabling us to realize more fully the value of such work as may be accomplished by an inter-denominational mission. Lord Wolseley, writing on this point, said: "All who take an interest in the welfare of our army must cordially approve of the good work being done among our soldiers in South Africa by your Mission. From my heart I wish the South Africa General Mission every success in its efforts to help men whom I know to be so well deserving of it;" while Lieut.-Col. Buchanan-Dunlop says, "I feel that one blessed result of this war has been the opportunity it has given for such work as that of the S.A.G.M. This opportunity has been seized by devoted servants of Christ, whose work has been owned of God and appreciated by all ranks of our army there." The experience gained previously by the Mission during eleven years of work among the men, placed it in an exceptional position for taking advantage of the opportunity presented.

DEEP INTEREST AROUSED.

"When Mr. James Taylor—along with Mr. Fleming, of the Soldiers' Christian Association—asked permission to work among the First Calvary Brigade in Natal, the commanding officer only agreed after learning that they were ex-soldiers, but added, "I am sure I shall have to turn you out at the end of a week." The later testimony of this officer was that not only had the workers been the means of blessing to his men, but also to himself and his staff. When work was begun, however, so deep was the interest aroused that an hour and a half before the commencement of a meeting men would be found patiently sitting in their greatcoats, and on blankets, with the sides of the tent all open, and the thermometer below freezing point, in order to be sure of getting a seat. No after-meetings were held at first, but when it was announced that inquirers would find the workers in an adjoining tent, as many as thirty men sought them out.

A SHINING LIGHT.

One of the men of the 5th Dragoons offered to use his cornet in the leading of the singing, making, however, one stipulation. His own words were, "I will gladly play for you if you will promise me one thing, and that is, that you will never speak to me about religion." "All right," said Mr. Taylor. The third night the man was noticed to be very uneasy in the meeting: at the close he dropped the cornet on a little table, saying to a friend, "Pack that up," and then ran away—where they did not know. That evening, after Mr. Taylor had retired to his tent, he heard someone calling to him, and asking if he might come in. On receiving a cordial, "Yes, of course, come in," who should enter but the cornet player! On inquiries being made as to what he wanted, he burst into tears and said, "I want rest and peace." He explained that after leaving the meeting he had rushed back to his tent, intending to get drink; but added, "I felt if I touched it, it would kill me." He had then gone for a walk trying to drown his feelings.

Mr. Taylor reminded the man that before he could speak to him he must have his leave to do so. However, after a searching time in the presence o :God, he then and there gave his heart to the Lord; and at the next meeting, before commencing to play, he came out to the front, and told all gathered there how he had accepted Christ as his personal Saviour the night before, and was now playing for the first time as a saved man. From that time onward, he has shown by lip, and better still by life, that he did indeed meet with the Saviour that evening.

A sum of about £13,000 is required to build permanent soldiers' homes in different centres in South Africa. For more than ten years a blessed work has been carried on at those in Cape Town and Wynburg, and about five years' ago another was opened at Pietermaritzburg. For £1,200 the present building at Johannesburg, could be altered to meet the present need, retaining a fine hall for meetings; £3,000 would provide a home at Pretoria, with prayer rooms at the various camps. Similar sums are required for either Bloemfontein or Kimberley, for prayer rooms at eight of the larger scattered camps, and for a home in Natal.

The work of the Mission is of a distinctively spiritual and aggressive character, and the workers enjoy the sympathy of Christian officers in high command at the front. The lady superintendent of a large soldiers' home in the South of England writes: "Collections at our services, gifts from friends, &c., have amounted to £150, and I have that sum to send you. We know that any homes under the management of the S.A.G.M. would be on unsectarian but entirely religious lines like our own." The address of the secretary, Mr. Arthur Mercer, is 17, Homefield Road, Wimbledon, London, S.W.

Moravian Missions.

THE Missions of the Moravian Church seem to be among the most admirable of many causes which are at present straitened through lack of funds. In their case the need is very great and pressing. Indeed the income to the General Fund is not even stationary, but continues to decrease steadily at a time when increase is sadly needed. The state of affairs has now come to be so serious that the very existence of some of the missions is imperilled, and this in the face of the fact that, in the words of the secretary (Rev. W. Wetton Cox), "the work in the different fields was never more blessed."

The Moravian Missions have been familiar to several generations of praying people in our country, and have been very dear to their hearts; but there is serious danger that in the multitude of new causes, however excellent, such "old fashioned" efforts run a great risk of being overlooked. The foundations of the work were laid in a spirit of heroism which moved deeply the hearts of many British Christians, and that same spirit is actuating the men who are carrying on the battle to-day. Rigorous climate, malarial atmosphere, hostile people—all have been calmly faced by simple-hearted men and gentle women, whose hearts burned within them to tell their less-favoured brothers and sisters of Him who had given his life for them. In a large constituency of supporters changes are continually taking place, and it is of great importance that new friends should rise up to take the places of those who pass away. What is desired is that those who are not at present supporters, and young people especially, should prayerfully examine the facts for themselves, and do as they may be led in the matter.

Pressure is particularly hard in Labrador, where for 130 years the Society for the Furtherance of the Gospel among the Heathen has maintained the missionaries, besides providing transit for them and their stores. Now the Society is placed in adverse circumstances over which it has no control, and the Labrador Mission threatens to become a charge on the already overtaxed "General Fund." On the Moskito Coast blow after blow has been falling on the work. A fire broke out which destroyed four important buildings, the demolition of the remaining premises being only prevented by a heavy fall of rain. More serious is the enactment of a new law anent schools, containing provisions with which the missionaries find themselves unable to comply, and which has resulted in the entire closing of that department. The fact that large funds are in hand for special purposes in no way relieves the urgency of the situation. Much prayer and generous help are required. Is it too much for this brave little Church, which has given so freely of its own men and means, to ask that Christian friends should relieve their present difficulty? The address of the London Association is 7, New Court, Lincoln's Inn, W.C.

A Stranger in Paris.

DECEMBER 20, 1872—1900.

TO-DAY the Mission Home for English Women in Paris enters upon its twenty-ninth year. Of those present at the meeting held to open and dedicate the Home to God, all have passed away, save the one who, years ago, wrote to the lonely English and American girls in Paris, signing her letter, "One who cares for you."

Each note was signed upon her knees, and given in trembling, yet in faith, as young women were discovered in shops, in attics, in cellars, working beneath the level of the street, upon which thousands of their countrywomen trod in the thoughtless gaiety of wealth.

Starving, tired, tempted in godless Paris, amid the loneliness of the most luxurious of cities, what wonder that the cry went up, "No man cared for my soul!" None but God knows the number of the wrecked, sorrowing, despairing, in the sunny days of the Empire, when all that money could give and purchase, was at its highest! And to-day? The small Home of twelve beds is the mother of four Homes, numbering 165. Into 77, Avenue Wagram alone, some 11,000 of our young countrywomen have been welcomed, sustained, cheered on life's way, and pointed to the Lord Jesus Christ. Over 7,000 situations have been found through the free registry, but, better than that—numbers have been led to seek, and to find a living Saviour.

During the Exposition months the Mission Hall, 79, Avenue Wagram, was turned into a dormitory. Hundreds have come to bless God for the ready help given and the perplexities solved during that season of temptation.

The doors of the Home have never been closed to the call for help. Old friends and supporters, whose sympathy was strong and practical, have passed away—we wait for God graciously to fill the gaps He has permitted. To-day is a day of need—younger workers are required to learn under those of sixteen and twenty-five years of unremitting service.

Mr. Brewer, 34, Westwick Gardens, West Kensington, who has just come from Paris, will gladly communicate with intending workers.

Zambesi Industrial Mission.

THE aim of this Mission, from the first, was to become self-supporting and self-propagating. It is gratifying to learn that it has succeeded in all that was attempted, except to make each parent station sufficiently strong to support another station equal in size. But the chief object of the Mission is to evangelize the natives of British Central Africa; all else is a means to this end. During the past eighteen months about 200 natives have been baptized on profession of their faith in Christ. There are at present associated with the Mission with an average attendance of more than 2,400 children. In many villages the people are willing to build schools themselves, and only ask the Mission to supply teachers and books. The superintendent, Mr. W. W. Miller, writes: "One encouraging feature of the school work is that the women now seem to have more desire to be educated, and are not so satisfied to remain in the background as they were. There are sewing classes held by several of the ladies, which are all well attended by the women. Scriptural teaching is imparted at every opportunity in the schools, at the dispensaries, in the sewing classes and workshops, and on the plantations. Last year we had a good coffee crop, and this year we expect eighty tons. I feel sure that the existing work can be comfortably supported by the coffee, except, perhaps, in very bad years. However, we do not intend to depend entirely upon coffee, but intend to grow wheat, etc. In fact, we refuse no legitimate way of earning money, if it does not interfere with the spiritual work specially entrusted to our care." Mr. Robert Caldwell, 1, Gresham Street, London, E.C., is the secretary of the Mission.

THIRTY-FOUR SCHOOLS,

Day by Day.

SUNDAY, December 16. Jeremiah xxxix.

THERE are two instances in this chapter of the way in which God takes care of his own in the midst of the most tremendous peril. It was a marvellous act of grace for the King of Babylon to give a special charge to his chief captain that no hurt should be done to Jeremiah. In point of fact the disaster which befel his own people became a source of enlargement and safety to him who had so persistently borne witness against their crimes. It was also very interesting that Ebed-Melech was delivered from the hand of the men of whom he was afraid, "because he had put his trust in God."

We turn from these incidents of the old-time world to those which have transpired before our own eyes within the last few months. It was only lately that I heard from the lips of a young man, whose college course I had watched from the earliest with warmest interest, of his marvellous journey of forty-nine days, from the distant Chinese province in which he was associated with eminent missionaries, to Hankow. Day after day it seemed as though the party of fugitives must perish at the hands of infuriated crowds. Stripped of their clothing, deprived of food, compelled to sleep in the open, or trudge for hours under a burning sun, they must have perished had it not been for Divine interposition. On one occasion, for instance, when half-famished, a Chinaman met them, and handed them thirty-six hard-boiled eggs. On another occasion, when within four miles of a city, a stranger accosted them, springing from a cart in which he was hidden, and warned them not to enter, because some thirty missionaries were on the point of being murdered. On another, a delay of thirty hours on the banks of a river secured the arrival of an edict of deliverance. I can only account for this by recalling the very definite prayer by which we put our young friend within the limits of Psa. xci. when he left us.

MONDAY, December 17. Jeremiah xl.

It is remarkable that Nebuzar-Adan, though an idolater, acknowledged Jehovah as the God of the Jews, and attributed the conquest of the place, so strongly fortified as Jerusalem was, to his displeasure. How significant it is to find these perpetual acknowledgments of God, and reference of all circumstances to his direct control; and to contrast this habit, which at least indicates reverence, with the majority of the despatches which come to us from the seat of war. The recognition of God is much less frequent to-day than, probably, at any previous time in the world's history.

On the troubled lot of Israel there came a rift of sunlight, as Gedaliah assumed the post of Governor, and it would have been a happy thing had he retained it. But it was not to be. Clouds of rebellion gathered again thick and dark. It seemed as though the chastening of God's people must be carried to the uttermost, so that neither root nor branch of the sinful stock might be left. The very foundations of the Hebrew race must be torn from the soil, that the new structure which was to spring into existence under the care of Nehemiah and Ezra might not be tainted.

So in dealing with those whom He proposes to use for his service, God often employs very drastic and thorough methods. He demands our death to the old man, with its affections and lusts, that we should put a clear line of desolation, as a frontier between our past and present; and that we should not carry with us the seeds of former harvests, but receive from Himself the graft of the Christ-life, which is a new creation, renewed unto knowledge in the image of Him that created.

TUESDAY, December 18. Jeremiah xli.

This chapter records a series of fearful crimes. With ruthless hands Ishmael slew scores of good and useful men, who would have been the foundation of a prosperous state, and one wonders with great astonishment that the Spirit of God should permit such wholesale massacre. The same question is perpetually accosting us as we notice the progress of the world through bloodshed, fire, and sword. Why does God allow massacre, rapine, and irremediable disaster?

We can only answer questions like these by remembering that mankind, like Israel of old, has chosen for the prince of this world the one who was a murderer from the beginning and abode not in truth. They must therefore abide by their choice. But so long as there is a preponderance of righteousness in any given country, the forces of evil are kept in abeyance. There is that which hindereth, as the apostle says. The salt stays the corruption; the presence of Noah holds back the Flood; the life of Lot, though it be an inconsistent one, postpones the fate of Sodom. The difference between England and China probably consists in the volume of intercession, praise, and prayer, which is ever arising to God. Holy and blessed spirits are congregated in the very air to resist the spread of sin's infection and plague. There is an arrest, therefore, put upon the forces of deterioration, which exist among us, which extends even to the heavenly places, and stays the malevolence of evil spirits from working out to its full manifestation. It is not impossible that the balance of good and evil in the realm above us is immediately proportioned to the preponderance of good or evil in any given country. When the disciples cast out a few demons, our Lord beheld Satan fall as lightning from Heaven.

WEDNESDAY, December 19. Jeremiah xlii.

Men who cannot pray for themselves have often profound faith in prayer. It was this consciousness that there was a power in the supplication of a holy man, which led to the remarkable request of vv. 2, 3. The same thought led Mary to say that she dreaded the prayers of Knox more than the navies of Philip of Spain. But how often, in the extremity of their distress, men pledge themselves with promises that they do not keep, as we shall see (Cf. v. 6, with xliii. 2-4). Be not swift to make promises to God, but having made them, stand to them till death, unless compelled to revise them by growing intelligence.

It is remarkable that Jeremiah was able to wait for ten days. Here was an urgent crisis which seemed to demand prompt action, and the fact that he was expected to give a prompt and final utterance must have greatly wrought upon him, urging him to anticipate the directing voice, and tempting him to take the first that came. Jeremiah, at least by this delay, gives evidence that he could truly detect the voice of the Good Shepherd, who said his own know Him, and hear his voice.

The answer was not as the people expected, but it was eminently sensible, to stay where Nebuchadnezzar had specially placed them. But a sad foreboding stole over Jeremiah's inner consciousness that his advice would not be followed. He was aware that the people who seemed so earnest in their resolves to obey God were dissembling in their hearts; hence the words from v. 19. Too often we are conscious of a deep aversion to the way which the Spirit suggests; and whilst we give it an outward adhesion, in our evil hearts we depart from the living God. Woe be to the man who judges after the sight of his eyes, and lives by sight rather than by faith.

THURSDAY, December 20. Jeremiah xliii.

All unwilling, the prophet found himself carried captive into Babylon. He knew quite well what the result would be. He foresaw that Nebuchadnezzar would invade Egypt, and avenge himself upon the truant people who had fled there. He would get possession of the country with as much ease as a shepherd puts on his garment. There was nothing for it, however, but to submit, and one of the saddest figures in history is that of the captive and protesting prophet, borne on the bosom of a current which was too furious and wild for him to resist.

Such times come to us all, and we are in a strait betwixt two, not knowing whether to seek life or death. We would be glad to die, and pass from this sea of troubles into the land of peace. Why should we stay longer out of our inheritance, or take arms against so great a sea of trouble? Why should we not cast ourselves beneath the juniper tree, and ask to die? What good will continued life do unto us? If only God would issue the command, so often heard from the deck of sea-going vessels, "Loose the shore-rope," how easy it would be to depart! But such dreams are not permitted to dwell long in the heart of the true servant. He realizes that he is needed still, that though his counsels are not followed, yet they have a salutary influence; there are at least a few amongst the people who have not forsaken God, and to whom his presence is a vast encouragement. To abide in the flesh is more needful.

FRIDAY, December 21. Jeremiah xliv.

How often God speaks to our heart in the very words which stand out from this page, "Oh, do not this abominable thing which I hate." The Spirit of God constantly utters them in the hearing of the soul as He lusts against the flesh, as He prevents us doing the things which otherwise we would. Whenever these words are spoken, it behoves us to listen, especially when we remember that the Divine hatred against our sin is measured by the supreme gift of our Saviour. The blood and agony of the Cross indicate how great that hatred is. If we love Him, we shall keep his commandments, and certainly not do the things He so emphatically reprobates.

The persistence of the Jews in adhering to their idolatrous rites, which had already forfeited Canaan, and which the prophet so indignantly denounced, shows how the votaries of the grossest evil may plead in its favour not only antiquity, universal prevalence, and human authority, but even the dispensations of providence. Such arguments, however, drawn from circumstances, are fallacious, and must not for a moment be pleaded at the bar of the soul against the impeachment of God's law. Our judgment may sometimes balance between this or the other course, as the more expedient, but conscience never hesitates. With unerring and unhesitating accents, she utters the decision of God, "This is an abominable thing which I hate." There is no answer, nor appeal from that pronouncement. Every man has these two sets of voices pleading within him: those of the crowd that misinterpret history to suit their passions, and the lonely voice of the prophet—conscience.

SATURDAY, December 22. Jeremiah xlv.

This short chapter contains a personal promise to Baruch, who had laid the prophet under great obligation, and whose heart misgave him in prospect of impending suffering. Of what good was it that he had washed his hands in innocency, and wrought on the behalf of Jeremiah? But he was assured that godliness is profitable for the life that now is, and that God is not unfaithful to forget a man's labour of love. I cannot but think that those mandarins who have shown kindness to fugitive missionaries will be borne in mind by God in the storms of sorrow which may yet visit China. Cups of clear water given because of the name of Christ will not be unnoticed.

What good advice is this! "Seek not great things." It is as though God said, Do not desire prominence. The cedars that stand high up on the mountain-side catch the full blast of the storm, whilst the bushes in the valley escape unscathed. The tall buildings in New York, which rise to sixteen or twenty storeys, tremble in the hurricane, whilst the cottages that stand along the shore, exposing less front to the wind, enjoy comparative immunity. The millionaire is kept awake at night by the least storm that beats through the atmosphere, because his fortune is afloat, whilst the labourer enjoys undisturbed repose. If God presses you into prominence, use it for Him, but remember there is a price to pay for position, and probably the happiest life is that which has neither poverty nor riches, and pursues its quiet, even, and lowly obscure course, canopied by the peace of God.

Governing our Criminals.

By Mr. CHAS. COOK.

"THOSE stars! how wondrously they shine; it is the first time I have seen them for eleven years." And my friend who had been having tea with me, and had taken his seat on the top of the 'bus, gazed upon the star-lit heavens with great delight, as those

> Diamond eyes of heaven,
> Looked down on the bond and the free.

He had just been discharged from Parkhurst prison after "doing" fifteen years' penal servitude. But had been won to Christ whilst in that model prison, not so much by what he had heard, as by what he had seen of Christian love and character exhibited by the governor of the gaol.

I was once visiting an American convict in Portsmouth prison, when he remarked: "This is the first visit I have received for sixteen years!" His friends were all in the States, and our faulty prison system did not allow any Christian or philanthropist, however suitable, or with whatever credentials, to visit him; and it was quite by accident that I became interested in him, and subsequently obtained his release some three years later. The man, however, never wrote to thank me, and it was only by the Home Secretary writing me, that I knew he had been arrested again and was lodged in a French prison! The man had become hardened by the harsh system, with its iron rules that know no relaxing; and the love shown him came too late to soften him.

Another prisoner, in another gaol, remarked, "This is the first hand-shake I have had for fourteen years;" and tears—those blessed safety-valves for pent-up feelings—burst from his eyes.

And yet this prisoner had been visited several times a year, but English prison rules forbid the wife or child from touching the hand, much less kissing the lips of the man, who at least may be dear to them.

The above goes to show, that much—I am bold to say all—that tends to humanize, yea, to Christianize, the criminal, had been carefully eliminated from our prison system; and what remained had become well adapted to brutalize and harden the men against all that was good or godly.

I have it on the highest authority that a rule was in vogue not very long ago, and may still be, that "not one word concerning the Lord Jesus was to be spoken by any of the officers to any prisoner." The excuse for this was, "It would be familiar conversation;" but happily I know that this rule was often "more honoured in the breach than the observance." In fact, there has lately come about a great change in the iron discipline of our prison system.

It was considered at the Home Office that any effort to bring about spiritual results in the lives of the criminals, or anything done to bring the comfort and consolations of the Gospel to bear upon those who were in suffering and sorrow, was so much mitigation of punishment, and therefore was looked upon by many governors as unwise, and therefore discouraged. Penal servitude was administered as a punishment for crime, and any attempt to reform the criminal was so much less punishment in their eyes.

I most gladly report that our system has been passing through a time of transition, and when a certain governor was promoted, it was almost generally admitted he was "the last of the old régime." I have met with this gentleman and others of the same stamp, and while going in and out of all our English prisons have bewailed the harshness and severity of the penal code which they certainly administered in the spirit of a Martinet. But I could not fail to see that, while in many cases it filled the "punishment cells," and added to the number of men "in chains," it failed to soften the men thus punished, but rather helped to steel them against the officials, and harden their hearts against God.

The authorities are now discovering what I saw and advocated twenty years ago, and are wisely permitting the introduction of a new force to our prisons; that is to say, they are allowing that prisoners can be changed into useful citizens by a change of heart caused by an influence wholly outside discipline; and it is matter for congratulation that, having gained some light upon this important matter, they at once commenced to act upon it, by permitting missions to be held, outside clerical influence, within the formerly closed walls of the prison chapel.

How this has been brought about would be too long a tale to tell here; no doubt many things have conduced to it; but the authorities have been aware that amongst the gentlemen acting as governors of H.M. Prisons have been some few whose modus operandi has been altogether different from that implied above, and we trust the lessons learned by the Home Office will lead to this practical result—that the greatest care will be exercised in choosing gentlemen who are capable of bringing Christian influence to bear on those whom they govern, that those to whom we commit the sufferers from sin, shall be such as have been themselves translated into the liberty which Christ alone can give.

COLONEL PLUMMER.

From Photograph by Mr. E. E. Smerdon, 14, High Street, Newport, I.W.

I am thinking particularly of Colonel Plummer, the man who has won untold numbers of convicts to Christ; many such have visited me on release. Three such men have recently been in the room where I am writing this—while seven letters are before me from ex-convicts, who date their conversion from the time that their iniquities gave them an introduction to the late Governor of H.M. Prison, Parkhurst. A strict disciplinarian, a stickler for order, a perfect soldier, a unique governor, and yet withal a loving, Christian gentleman—this is my friend with whom I first became acquainted many years ago, when he was in office at Dartmoor convict prison.

The Colonel is old enough to have seen service in the trenches at Sebastopol, and the Mutiny in India, but has now for many years been caring for our prison populations. I saw and knew of many instances in Dartmoor, where he had been greatly used of God. He told me of one man who had recently been discharged after twenty years' imprisonment—a man who had never had a mark against his character whilst he had been there the whole twenty years. Another convict said:—"I was converted while cleaning the windows of the governor's bed-room, for over his bed was the text, 'He is our Peace.' It made me think, and Jesus soon after spoke peace to my soul." It was in this prison, and of the Colonel that the incident I tell in my lecture "The Prisons of the World,"* happened:—

"Do you know anything of the Grace of God, Collins?" asked the governor of a convict for life.

"Thank God, I do, sir."

"How long has it been?"

"Some years, now, sir; as I entered my cell, and the door slammed to with a jar, I fell on my knees, and, as I remembered my mother's prayers, and my father's tears, I accepted Christ as my Saviour, and I thank God I have never had a dark hour since."

Poor fellow! and yet how rich! A convict for life! What misery! and yet withal, what solace! In all my wanderings, and midst many preachings, I know no grander testimony to the power of the Gospel of Christ.

But it is at Parkhurst that Colonel Plummer has found his life-work, and numbers of men leave the place thankful that ever they were branded as convicts, for as such they have listened to "thoughts that breathe, and words that burn," that have been spoken by the governor, and have reached their souls.

Men who have slipped from the higher ranks of life have found in the Colonel a spiritual father and a brother in Christ, whilst professional criminals have told me that they owe their salvation to him.

"He is the first Christian governor I ever saw; I have seen some who were more like devils; but that man—God send more like him!"

Thus spake one who was known as "the King of the Forgers," now a consistent believer.

"The dear governor, how I love him," said an ex-convict.

"He writes to me twice a week," said another; "and as for young Moore, he's allowing him £1 week till he can get work."

The secret of the success which has attended the Colonel's work is—that he differentiates; he has treated no two men alike, and his discrimination has been a help to him. Writing to me of three ex-convicts whom he had commended to my care, he said, "Thank you so much for your kindness to my three friends."

Some governors treat criminals "in the lump;" to them they are all criminals. Colonel Plummer sees in them souls for whom Christ died—that love will reach the worst of men, and that the Gospel, lived and preached, will change the vilest criminals.

Born at Heworth Vicarage, Durham, in 1838, the Colonel joined the Army in 1854, and served with the Royal Fusiliers in the Crimea from July 7, 1855, and in India for eleven years, including a period of the Mutiny, and two campaigns against the Hill tribes of the North-West frontier under Sir Neville Chamberlain, G.C.B., in the latter as Q.M.G. He served in the United Kingdom from 1870 to 1878, when he entered the Prisons Department, and was sent as deputy-governor to Borstal Prison, remaining there for seven years, when he was transferred to Dartmoor Convict Prison. From thence he was promoted to be governor of Borstal Convict Prison, and after four years to Parkhurst Convict Prison. During his charge of this prison, it was turned into an invalid station for all breakdowns of mind or body, also a lunatic ward was added, causing a great increase of work and anxiety.

The Colonel retired on superannuation last month, thus closing a career of forty-six years in the public service, of which twenty-two years were spent in the prison service. He has the great joy of knowing that God's blessing has rested upon his word and example, as well as upon his work in the discharge of his onerous duties.

* Mr. Cook would be willing to give this Lecture (which is illustrated by costumes of the countries in which he has travelled) either in London or the country. Address: 6, Frithville Gardens, W.

THE LATE

Mr. Henry Wood.

By Rev. JOHN BRADFORD, Leytonstone.

WHEN our Lord "ascended up on high, He led captivity captive, and gave gifts unto men . . . And He gave some, apostles; and some, prophets; and some, evangelists," &c. The gifts He gave were men—saved and consecrated men. The Baptist denomination is mourning the loss of such a gift in the person of one of its most notable members, Henry Wood, J.P., of Gresham Street, City; Champion Hill, Camberwell; and Southend-on-Sea.

He was born of a good Devonshire stock in 1842, and among his ancestry were some of the aristocracy of God's people, those "of whom the world was not worthy;" men and women who were bold in the maintenance of truth in the bad old times of persecution. Some of these were members of the little church at Loughwood, near Honiton, and among them was the heroic Sarah Denning. A soldier had been told off on one occasion to bar the entrance to the little chapel, and to forbid the worship. As the congregation gathered, they found him holding the doorway with drawn sword. The men were timid, and it was left for Sarah to say, "If none of you men will take the lead, I will." So saying, she boldly marched up to the soldier, who was so taken aback that he not only let her pass, but permitted the rest of the congregation to follow! They worshipped God that day under their own roof-tree.

Though his father belonged to the Anglican Communion, and had his children duly "christened," the latter were early found in the Baptist Sunday school, and here later the father also found a spiritual home. The minister of the Honiton church at that time was Rev. W. Evans Foote, who still remains with us. His ministry was much blessed to the young men of his congregation, and when sixteen years of age young Wood confessed Jesus Christ as Lord in the ordinance of baptism.

The earnest Christian life of the young man was both manifested and maintained by diligent attendance at a seven o'clock Sunday morning prayer meeting, and in the darker winter months our friend not only undertook to call some of his companions, but himself provided the cheery fire in the vestry for their mutual comfort in the gathering. His education at a school at Tiverton was unexpectedly abbreviated, for before he was thirteen years of age he was called to enter the office of a friend, who was a solicitor, and the coroner for one of the divisions of Devonshire. Here he speedily made an important position for himself, and after a time was offered his "articles," which, however, he declined.

In connection with his work in this office he became acquainted with Mr. Joseph Locke, M.P., who was so much interested in him as to offer him a Government appointment in India. He had, however, considerable ties in the way of voluntary association with Sunday school, social, educational, and political service; and in addition to his office work, which included the Law and Land Agency, he acted as correspondent for one of the most important of the Devonshire newspapers.

In the early sixties he came into contact with the late Mr. Beadel, M.P., D.L., who was purchasing for a client a large property in the district of Honiton, and who was deeply impressed by the professional capacity and thoroughness of young Mr. Wood. Before leaving Honiton, he said to Mr. Wood, sen.: "If your son ever thinks of coming to London, let him come to me, and I will find him a stool in my office." Some time passed before the offer was accepted, but in 1865, at the age of twenty-three, the young man came to the great city. He at once took his place in Mr. Beadel's own room, to see the nature of the business transacted, and he very speedily became a thoroughly trusted helper. Then followed partnership, and ultimately he became, on the death of Mr. Beadel, in 1892, the head of the firm.

His first residence in London was at Camberwell, and he promptly associated himself with Denmark Place Chapel. Here he became, first a teacher, later on secretary, next the treasurer, and ultimately one of the superintendents of the Sunday-school. Among the boys in his class was the late T. J.

Comber, so well-known as one of the pioneers of Mission work on the Congo; and in the earlier stages of his last illness Mr. Wood was greatly cheered by a visit from an "old boy" who had some years before emigrated to Australia. It was a case of "riotous living" in "a far country," with the sequel of a serious illness in one of the hospitals. Happily, however, the treatment was successful, and the young man recovered. On leaving the hospital destitute, he overhauled his few belongings to see what he could sell for immediate necessity. Here he found a Scripture card which Mr. Wood had given him at the time of his leaving England. The card called up the old memories; and the remembrance of the parting words of his teacher so touched his heart that he sought and found the salvation which is in Christ Jesus. With the new life had come prosperity, and his first impulse on coming home for a holiday to the old country was to find his former teacher and tell him the story of Divine grace.

In addition to this Sunday-school service, Mr. Wood took part in the work of the old Nelson Street Ragged School Mission, now the Camberwell Mission, in co-operation with Mr. Travers Buxton, ever doing with his might what his hands found to do. His striking presence and persuasive manners made it possible for him to exercise a personal ministry with great acceptance, and there are very many who were led to decision for Christ as the result of individual testimony and private appeals made by Mr. Wood as opportunity offered.

In addition to his diligent labour in connection with the school, as deacon and in other capacities he served the Church over which the late beloved Dr. Stanford presided, and threw himself very heartily, so far as time and opportunity permitted, into all efforts which meant the glory of God through the salvation of men. In 1875 he assisted Professor Drummond in the Young Men's Meetings connected with Mr. Moody's work, and into these he put all the ardour of an earnest nature. He became president for several years in succession of the Lambeth Band of Hope Union, joined the Council of the Ragged School Union, and ultimately became its chairman. He was treasurer of the Baptist Total Abstinence Association, and of the Camberwell Auxiliary of the London City Mission; took a very deep interest in the work of the Baptist Tract and Book Society, giving to it a very large amount of the most valuable time and thought, and ultimately becoming its treasurer. In 1899 he became treasurer of the Baptist Union, and one of the treasurers of its Twentieth Century Fund.

His heavenly citizenship, of course, permeated all his feelings in relation to civic and national affairs, and with his well-known saneness of judgment and conscientiousness he threw himself into all movements, political and philanthropic, which promised good for the districts with which he was connected. He was throughout his whole life interested in the Education question, and at the last London School Board Election compiled and issued a leaflet, which was circulated on a very large scale throughout the Metropolis, dealing with the question from a distinctly Christian standpoint.

He was always a generous giver, and with increasing prosperity exercised increasing liberality. His was a consecrated life. He gave time, talent, and judgment to the management of the affairs of the Kingdom of Christ without stint, and in increasing measure he gave his money into the Lord's treasury. It was his plan to increase his giving each year, with the intention, after making due provision for his needs, that every penny earned in his profession should thus ultimately be devoted to the Lord's work. He had about reached this standpoint when he was called to the higher service.

Though he was invited on three or four occasions to become a candidate for Parliament, his professional, and more especially his Christian and denominational work, so absorbed his time and energies, that he felt no difficulty in declining these overtures as they were made to him. He was made a Justice of the Peace for Southend-on-Sea in 1894 by Lord Herschell, who had met him in the course of his professional work, and who was so impressed by his sterling character that he made the appointment without a nomination from either political party.

In his last letter, addressed to Rev. Dr.

Maclaren, and which he wrote in pencil, there is an unfinished sentence which begins, "Spiritual and evangelistic." More than any other two words, they fitly describe the outstanding features of his life. The spirituality of the Church, assured by the conversion and spiritual development of each of its members, was a very strong conviction, and this led him to watch that ample time should be given to prayer, especially in the great gatherings of the denomination, that Divine energy and grace should be abundantly bestowed for all the work to be accomplished in the extension of the Kingdom of the Lord Jesus Christ.

In 1867 he married a daughter of Mr. Abraham Madge, a yeoman of Gittisham, near Honiton, and all who knew them during their thirty years of married life know how nearly the union was an ideal one. In 1868 a son was given to them, who survives—happily like-minded—to CONTINUE THE FATHER'S NAME AND WORK.

Mr. Wood was never quite the same man after the loss of his wife in 1896. She had been for some time very much of an invalid, though her heart and mind devised many happy forms of service which, through the hands of others, she was enabled to carry out. However, he continued fully at work save for the usual holiday breaks. In August of last year two or three weeks were spent in Switzerland, and the friend who accompanied him noticed again and again how he suffered from what appeared at the time his inability to stand the atmosphere of the higher altitudes, though it was probably an early manifestation of the fatal mischief. It was clear that he came back to England little, if any, better for his stay among the Alps.

The plans for the holidays of the past summer all had to be cancelled, and specialists were consulted as to his condition. It was very evident that he was suffering acute pain all through the month of September. His thoughts, however, were for others, and in the intervals of pain he talked over with his only son

THE THINGS THAT LAY NEAR TO HIS HEART.

He attempted, the week before the meetings of the Baptist Union at Leicester, to write in pencil the letter to Dr. Maclaren to which reference has been made, and which was suggested by his earnest solicitude in connection with the progress of the Twentieth Century Fund. He had been the largest contributor thereto, and the joy it gave to him led him to desire that others should enjoy what he felt had been to him a great privilege.

On Monday morning, October 2, in an interview with Rev. J. H. Shakespeare, M.A., the secretary of the Union, he expressed himself as being "at perfect peace, and ready to wait and work, or go and praise." Through a week in which hope and fear intermingled, with his son as his constant companion, he waited, and on Saturday evening, October 6, passed into

THE PRESENCE OF HIS SAVIOUR AND LORD.

It was the anniversary of the home-going of his beloved wife four years before.

His patient bearing of suffering, and his beautiful Christian spirit, impressed everybody. In a private letter to the son, which we have received permission to quote, Sir William Broadbent writes:

I was greatly attracted and impressed by your father's personality. I have never seen illness and pain borne with such cheerfulness, or death met with more confidence and fortitude. I consider it an honour to have attended such a man, and I shall always remember him. I do not wonder that there has been an outburst of affection and admiration. His life and death are a proof of the power and reality of religion, and must be a precious heritage to the Baptist denomination as well as to you.

CAMBRIDGE.

LAST week an evangelistic mission was held in connection with Zion Chapel. The mission was conducted by Rev. W. Bampton Taylor, and the meetings were well attended throughout.

On Thursday, November 29, a social evening, in connection with the "Men only" and "Women only" services in St. Barnabas, was held. Rev. J. E. Watts-Ditchfield was present, and spoke.

Preaching in Holy Trinity Church on Sunday evening, November 25, Professor Moule made sympathetic reference to the death of Rev. Alfred Peache. The living of Holy Trinity is in the gift of the Peache Trustees.

The appointment of Dr. Ryle, President of Queens' College, to the Bishopric of Exeter, will create a gap in the University, which will be hard to fill. Dr. Ryle has made his influence greatly felt, and he will be sadly missed by all.

The annual meeting of the Cambridge Female Refuge was held last week. The speakers included the Master of Corpus Christi (Dr. Perowne) and the Principal of Ridley Hall (Rev. T. W. Drury). The chaplain (Rev. T. Kingdon Allen, vicar of Barnwell) spoke in very bright and encouraging tones.

It was recorded in these columns a few weeks ago that Rev. John Harford Battersby had been appointed vicar of Holy Sepulchre. This arrangement has now fallen through, owing to his appointment as Principal of the Midland Clergy College, Birmingham. Mr. Battersby has been Vice-Principal of Ridley Hall for the last three years. He will be surely missed in both the University and the town. He leaves Cambridge early in January.

OXFORD.

OXFORD Evangelicals have had the privilege of a course of seven lectures on Protestant teaching, arranged by the National Protestant Church Union. Rev. W. H. Griffith Thomas, of Portman Chapel, was the lecturer, and has treated successively the following subjects: Supremacy of Holy Scripture, Justification, the Church, the Ministry, the Sacraments, Confession and Absolution, and Prayers for the Dead. Large congregations have assembled, and a fair number sat for an examination last week in the subjects of the lectures. Every opportunity of giving definite Protestant teaching is to be welcomed, and we are glad to see the vigorous way in which the N.P.C.U. is prosecuting the educational side of its work.

The cause of Missions to Deep Sea Fishermen in Labrador was pleaded on Monday by Mr. F. W. Willway, M.R.C.S., the Rector of Lincoln presiding over a well-filled hall in the Municipal Buildings. This Society, which was inaugurated in 1881 by the Thames Church Mission, has now fifteen Mission Ships and six doctors regularly at work, and not only sends out each summer an army of volunteer missionaries, but maintains active practical work in six fishing ports. The following interesting figures for the past year were given at the meeting: patients treated medically and surgically, North Sea, 9,571; Labrador, 1,454; missionary visits paid, 9,085; services held (at sea), 2,701; woollens sold to men, value £311; healthy literature distributed, 51 tons, 6 cwt., 3 qrs., 22 lbs.

The annual meeting of the Church of England Zenana Missionary Society was held in the hall of Exeter on Tuesday. Mr. B. H. Baden-Powell presided, and Miss Bartlett addressed the meeting on the Society's work in India. Miss Bartlett has been at work for the last five years in the villages of the Punjaub, and previous to this he was connected with St. Katherine's Hospital at Amritzar. She does not claim to be a medical missionary, but the value of medical knowledge in the mission field is illustrated in the work Miss Bartlett has been enabled to do. Often, she said, 200 sick women were gathered daily, and these were, in addition to receiving medical treatment, taught, and read to, and the Gospel message preached to them. She ended her address with an earnest appeal for lady workers.

A united gathering of the P.S.A. Societies in Oxford was held in the Town Hall on Sunday afternoon. The Mayor presided, and Mr. A. Holden Byles, of Leeds, editor of the P.S.A. Leader, was the speaker. In the course of his address, Mr. Byles showed what the societies were doing in the country. They had about 1,250 societies, an army of registered workers, larger than our present army in South Africa, and at least 50,000 sisters. They ought to be a mighty force for good. Mr. Byles showed how men were gathered together from the lowest strata of society, how after attending a few meetings these men entered on a new life, and quoted the testimony of the Chief Constable of his own county, who told him that since the P.S.A. meetings had started they were able to do with fewer policemen.

Welsh Notes.

THE Cardiff Wesleyan Mission has celebrated its seventh anniversary. The Mission has been a powerful influence for good in one of the lowest districts of the Welsh metropolis.

The official report of this year's Welsh Baptist Union meetings has just been published. The additional matter provided make the publication a valuable year-book. One curious feature of the report is a list of ministers who are total abstainers.

In view of the approach of the annual collection towards the Welsh Forward Movement, Rev. Dr. Pugh has issued a deeply interesting statement. During the last six months, no less than five new halls have been opened in populous centres. One of these—opened in June last—has already branched in two directions. Although the movement is essentially of Wales, and for Wales, it contemplates an interesting extension of the sphere of its operations. In response to appeals from the Forest of Dean, it is not improbable that it will soon be represented in that district.

Another interesting feature of the Movement is its absorption of other similar but unattached agencies. Amongst these latter was the Barry Dock Mission, initiated and carried on by Mr. Gerald Coultas. Another application for admission into the ranks of the Movement has now been made by the Neath Mission. This mission is one of the most successful of its kind in Wales.

One of the best known of Welsh Baptist ministers has just passed away in the person of Rev. Thomas Lewis, of Newport, Mon. Mr. Lewis was born in Builth, Breconshire, and at the time of his death was seventy-seven years of age. His first ministerial charge was at Llanthewey, followed by pastorates at Llanelly, Rhymney, Carmarthen, and Risca. Until his retirement from active ministerial some fifteen years ago, Mr. Lewis was a popular preacher in both English and Welsh. For years he was secretary of Pontypool Baptist College, and did much to promote the welfare of the institution.

Irish Notes.

THE Mission to Seamen at Dublin has been doing a good work. The congregations have averaged 231 men, and as many as 150 men have sat down to the free tea on a Sunday evening. The chaplain is Rev. J. Furde Leathley.

The Belfast Presbytery have taken a new departure, and have resolved to commemorate the Lord's death together at their first meeting in January, which will be also their first meeting in the twentieth century.

For some reason the proposal recently made, that all the Church of Ireland Young Men's Societies in the country should amalgamate and form one body with a paid travelling secretary, so that a member in one society could be a member in any other similar society does not seem to be going to work. About 1,000 circulars on the subject have been sent to parishes, and to these only about six replies have been received—a fact which has greatly discouraged the promoters of the movement.

The Edgar Home, Belfast, which has been about sixty years in existence, continues to do a good work. Last year 208 women received the benefits of the Home for a longer or shorter period, and of these sixteen received outfits and were sent to situations, and twenty were restored to friends. The committee have also taken Whitehall and about two acres of land, and here they will have room for seventy-five inmates at once, and will have space, if need be, for further development. Moreover, in the Home during the year the religious services have been well maintained, and the Gospel has been faithfully preached.

The Methodists, under the direction of Rev. Charles Inwood, are making extensive preparations for inaugurating the Twentieth Century by a great Simultaneous Mission. District conventions have been held in reference to the matter in Belfast, Clones, Portadown, and Waterford. On one circuit already several conversions have taken place, and on another upwards of eighty persons have professed to decide for Christ. A Prayer Union has also been started, for which some 12,000 tickets have been issued, and it is hoped that this Union will obtain at least as many as 30,000 members in a short time.

Booklets about the War.—The South Africa General Mission is adding from time to time to its series of booklets. Those entitled "At Modder River," "The Surrounding of Cronje," "At Ladysmith," "With General Buller's Force in Natal," each detail incidents of mission work among soldiers in battle and siege. There are no more interesting tracts to distribute at the present time. The illustrations greatly add to their attractiveness. Evangelistic.

Mr, Henry Thorne in St. Helens.

A FORTNIGHT'S united mission, under the auspices of the Free Church Council at St. Helens, has just been held in that town. Mr. Henry Thorne took charge of the mission in the outlying district of Sutton.

Bible readings were given in the Wesleyan Chapel every afternoon by Mr. Thorne, and stirring Gospel addresses every evening to congregations growing steadily in numbers, a rich harvest of testimony to the power of the Gospel being seen in the inquiry rooms each night.

The usual Sunday morning and evening services were conducted by Mr. Thorne, and addresses were given on the Sunday afternoons, one to the scholars of the churches associated in the Mission, while meetings were held respectively for men and women only.

Irish Evangelization Society.

During the past seven weeks one of the Society's large movable halls, capable of seating 600 persons, has been placed at Edentrillick, Dromore, co. Down, and mission services have been conducted by Messrs. Peatt and Griffith. The presence and power of the Holy Spirit was very evident from the first. Night after night large congregations attended, many coming from a distance of three and four miles.

On Sunday evenings the hall was crowded to excess, and many had to be turned away for want of room. The closing night will be long remembered; the power and presence of God moved many to tears, and quite a large number remained for the after-meeting, which lasted two hours. There were many persons seeking the Lord.

The prayers of God's people are desired for the next mission, which is to be held in Lisburn in January.

Mr. W. R. Lane at Wakefield.

Following Rev. Dr. Barrett, Mr. W. R. Lane conducted the second week of services arranged at Wakefield by the Free Church Council. Mr. Lane was introduced at a workers' meeting on Saturday, November 24, and commenced his mission services the following morning at the Baptist Chapel. In the afternoon, West Parade Wesleyan Chapel was well filled with a congregation largely composed of Sunday scholars, who had been specially invited. In the evening the missioner preached in Market Street U.M.F. Church. From Monday to Thursday of the same week Mr. Lane conducted a service every evening in West Parade Chapel. The Monday meeting was again the best attended. During the earlier part of the week Miss Barrett, who had come to assist Dr. Barrett and had kindly volunteered further aid, was present to sing at every service.

For a lantern service on "John Bunyan and the Pilgrim's Progress," the Corn Exchange, the largest hall in the town, had been taken, and was well filled. The most notable service of all was, however, probably that of Sunday afternoon, December 2, when West Parade Chapel was filled with about 1,200 men. The special efforts made to secure a numerous audience were rewarded by what was probably one of the largest gatherings of men ever seen in Wakefield.

The Sunday services in Market Street Primitive Methodist and West Parade Chapels were well attended, whilst, in spite of very bad weather, West Parade was again filled on Monday night, for the closing service of the mission, when Mr. Lane gave the story of his own conversion.

The first meetings were crowned with visible results, which continued to accompany the work, but the fruits of a mission became evident in the whole subsequent life of the churches concerned. For this reason the writer has not been concerned to enquire how many professed conversion during the mission. His impression is that the results have mainly been the bringing to a clear decision of many, especially young people.

Mr. H. F. Pouncey has conducted a mission at the Valley Junction Wesleyan Chapel, co. Durham. Blessing was given, and there were inquirers after the way of salvation.

A fortnight's mission has been conducted at the Primitive Methodist Chapel, Cashes Green, Glos., by Mr. S. Craggs, of Sunderland. Throughout the meetings there was manifest blessings. On Sundays the building was crowded.

Mr. Charles Inglis recently conducted an eleven days' mission at Kensal Rise Tabernacle. It proved a blessing to many. A deep impression was made amongst the children; the spiritual results greatly cheered the teachers.

Mr. Newton Jones (Evangelist of the Sunday School Union) has held a ten days' mission at Mount Pleasant Chapel, Swansea. The meetings for the children and for adults, the Bible readings, and his lectures, have been much blessed.

At Kelvinside Baptist Church, Glasgow (Rev. A. W. Bean), a time of refreshing is being experienced. During the past month thirteen have been added to the church. A fortnight's mission is being held under the ministry of Mr. Walter Notman, of the "Edinburgh Castle," London, and Rev. Robt. Clark, John Street Church, Glasgow.

Mr. James Walker, of Edinburgh, has conducted evangelistic services at the Memorial Mission Hall, Kendal. Pastor C. Pettler reports that there have been striking instances of blessing. Congregations were good, and a distinguishing feature being the evening services for children. It is believed that many of the young people have been won for the Saviour.

Mr. H. Morris, missionary to railway men for Manchester and district, writes: "Mr. John Hawkins has conducted evangelistic services at the Railway Mission, Longsight, Manchester. We had a time of blessing, and many came out on the Lord's side. Mr. Hawkins also spoke to the railway employés at the dining rooms at the large stations. The men listened attentively to the Word of Life, and many were blessed."

Mr. Herbert Francis has conducted services at the Gospel Hall, Consett. A correspondent writes: "Mr. Francis has given lectures on the Tabernacle, illustrating his remarks from a model which he has with him. The meetings have been well attended, and many have been blessed and built up in the truth. Mr. Francis preached the Gospel to a crowded audience on Sunday night, and there has already been fruit."

Encouraging mission services have been conducted by Mr. Charles E. Barraclough at the Union Church, King's Lynn. In spite of unpropitious weather, large numbers of people assembled night after night. The Word was faithfully and powerfully preached. Sinners sought the Lord, and many backsliders were reclaimed. The result of the mission is a marked increase in the spiritual life of the Church.

C. Houghton, Pastor.

Mr. Sampson Cowley has conducted a mission at the Primitive Methodist Chapel, Keynsham. The meetings were, in point of numbers, the best held in the chapel for years, and they were continued a week longer than at first arranged. There were several definite cases of blessing, and one feature of Mr. Cowley's work was his visitation to the people's homes, which was productive of much good. (Mr. Cowley may be addressed, Rosebery Villa, Albert Road, Keynsham, Bristol.) W. T. P. Rammino.

Mr. Leonard Weaver has visited Birmingham. On Monday evening of last week he spoke to a large gathering of Christians in Trinity Hall. Mr. Weaver spoke convincingly on the need for true and godly workers, and his words have already borne fruit. At one mission, an all-night prayer meeting was subsequently held, and reports have been received showing that many persons have fully consecrated their lives to the Master's service, as a result of Mr. Weaver's earnest appeal.

The St. Helens Free Church Council have had four missions, from November 18 to December 2. One of them was held at the Nutgrove Wesleyan Church, and was conducted by Rev. D. M. Cameron, of Union Tabernacle, London. Some of the meetings were characterized by great spiritual power. Four or five women, addicted to strong drink, came forward as penitents, and there was a large number of other inquirers, both young and old. The members of the church have been quickened, and are looking forward to a continued manifestation of God's converting power.

Mr. Musa Bhai (the Indian Evangelist) has just completed a twelve days' mission in our Nicholas Road Gospel Hall, Bristol. The services have been well attended throughout, the Sunday meetings crowded to excess. His message was owned of God in the conversion of souls, the restoration of backsliders, and the quickening and reviving of Christians.

Jas. A. Vicary.

The mission recently conducted at Alliance, Ohio, by Rev. C. H. Yatman, attracted very large audiences. The Alliance Daily Review, describing one of the Sundays, says: "A mass meeting of men, entirely filling the Presbyterian church, heard Mr. Yatman's powerful presentation of 'Lamb or Tiger, Which?' Men were moved by scores under the clear, candid, and truthful description of the tendencies and possibilities of a man's life as a Christian. A large number came out on a profound resolve for a better life. On Sunday night, the main auditorium of the Methodist church was crowded."

A fifteen days' mission at Newtown St. Boswells, conducted by Mr. D. M. Bayne, of the Evangelization Society, under the auspices of the Railway Mission, was recently concluded. God's message was faithfully and lovingly delivered, and the power of the Holy Spirit was manifested each night. In spite of the inclemency of the weather numbers walked long distances nightly, proving that the Gospel story has not lost its power. The local ministers joined heartily in the mission. The concluding service was most impressive. Some precious souls have sought the Saviour, and God's children have been stimulated and strengthe ed. To God be all the glory.

H. S. Grant.

A fifteen days' mission has been concluded at Wadham Street Baptist Church, Weston-super-Mare, by Rev. F. C. Spurr, whose reasoned addresses and powerful pleading made a deep impression on increasingly large audiences. A valuable series of Conferences on the Christian life were held in the afternoons, and drew together representatives of most of the Evangelical churches of the town. A striking feature of the mission was the interest manifested by thoughtful men, in whose behalf special meetings were held on Sunday afternoons. The services have proved a blessing to many, both young and old, and were rendered additionally attractive by the sweet Gospel singing of Mr. H. Kearns.

Obituary.

REV. JOHN ALDIS, JUN.

WE regret that, in our last issue, we announced the decease of Rev. John Aldis, sen., doyen of the Baptist ministry. Mr. Aldis, who has passed his ninety-second birthday, is still living and in fairly good health. The announcement, however, which should have been made was that the eldest son and namesake of Mr. Aldis has passed away. John Aldis, jun., who was born in 1837, fell asleep in Jesus at Little Leigh, in Cheshire, on November 27 last. In early life he received a business training, but manifesting gifts for preaching, he received training at the Bristol College. He has done useful work for the Lord at Hitchin, Canterbury, Sutton (in Yorkshire), Batley, and latterly at Little Leigh. He preached, as usual, on Lord's Day, November 18, and in nine days passed to be with the Master he so loved and served.

I want to interest my elder "Young People" every week in what Mr. Meyer writes on the Christian Endeavour Topic. Parents will also find the S.S. Lesson Notes suggestive and helpful for Sunday talks with their young folk. (See next page.)

Mercy.

MOST people—boys and girls particularly—have some object, in work or in play, which they try to keep in view. They are always longing and striving for something, or to be like some person they know and love. Some men and women long for happiness, others for success, or for virtue; some for wealth, and so on. Often they are called "ambitious" people, or are said to have an "ideal" always before them.

Have you ever thought that in the Christian life there is an ideal that should always be kept in view, and after which all should strive? There is a text in the Old Testament which sets forth the Christian's ideal, for in a very few words it states what is required of him by God. In Micah vi. 8 you will find it. It is "to do justly, and to love mercy, and to walk humbly with thy God." Each of these three requirements, if meditated upon, would soon reveal how much these lives of ours might be beautified by trying to fulfil them; but this time rather let us consider Mercy, which is something which God requires to love.

Mercy implies a great deal. It implies gentleness, thoughtfulness, a large, kind heart; in fact, Mercy includes "lovingkindness"—brotherly and sisterly tenderness and affection. It is just what is needed in your games, in school, at home, in friendship, and all through life, and the greatest happiness comes to those who have this quality. At play there may be a companion who is not quite so strong as you are, and when the game grows boisterous, as it may do, it is not always easy to remember that one. Again, in the class, your schoolfellow may not be so clever as you, and you are tempted to think it does not matter—that it is his own fault. If, however, you have planted in your heart that little golden seed which springs up into the fair flower of "lovingkindness," you will delight to shield the weak companion, and to find time to help your schoolfellow.

The question comes: "How may I become merciful?" The secret is found in a homely word—Love. It must be so. Those who love flowers, read about them, try to understand them; and gradually the flowers impart their beauty to the lives of those who love them. Also, to the lover of music, how dear does the violin or sweet instrument become! His whole soul is in his music, and the violin seems to speak to him. A little girl has a schoolfellow, whom she loves very dearly, and just because of the love, she shares with her friend all her pleasures, and she wishes her friend to have the best she can wish for herself. Is not her life sweeter for sharing the pleasures of her friend?

Just so with Mercy. If you will love mercy, then mercy will show itself in you. But you cannot learn to do this alone; you must have a guide. And the guide in whose hand you must place your own, is Jesus, who went about doing good—not only mighty deeds, but simple acts of mercy. He beautified and brightened sad lives, gave joy for tears; and out of tender mercy and loving kindness for sinners, gave Himself to die for them. To have learned to love Jesus is to have learned how to love; and his gentle spirit of mercy, with all its blessedness, will then show itself in you, and stream out in your life and work.

Look at the other side of the picture. Is there anything more ugly, more unlovable than mean, selfish souls? Such people miss the rich reward which mercy brings. It is a double reward; for to show mercy in your life, is to be loved yourself in return; and thus you will prove to yourself the truth of the words of Jesus, "Blessed are the merciful, for they shall obtain mercy." But that is only the smallest part of the reward; in addition to that, you will enjoy the truest happiness in life. Have you ever thought how bare and cold and loveless this world would be were there no opportunities for showing mercy—that is to say, were there no sick ones, no weak ones, no poor ones, upon whom to lavish your lovingkindness? Do not forget that just as mercy fills all life with beauty, so a lack of mercy will change its sweetest music into sobs, its brightness into gloom, its joy into sadness, and tender loving hearts will break. Try and reach this part of the Christian ideal, remembering that "He that followeth after righteousness and mercy, findeth life."

CONFESSING CHRIST (Matt. x. 32-39).

I NEVER read this verse without remembering how urgent its call was to myself, years ago. It was the compulsion of its appeal which led me to take my place as a member of a Christian Church. I was fearful lest I should be denied. Probably, however, the confession and denials are not confined to these special acts, but to that unhesitating decision for God which extorts even from the enemies of its truth an acknowledgment of respect. It is not necessary that a man should be always interlarding his phraseology with references to religion, or quoting his religious life as an argument to secure his credit, but that there should be no covering of his light with the bushel.

What a great day that will be when He who has kept us from falling, will present us to his Father, before the presence of his Glory, with exceeding joy! How great an honour to be confessed before all worlds! There is a parable of a subject who dared to stand beside his prince, when the citizens put him in the pillory, and drove him through the streets. Whatever contumely was heaped upon the one was gladly welcomed by the other. But the years brought a reversal of the verdict of that city. Amid the pealing of bells, and waving of banners, at the head of his triumphal army, the prince returned to the city from which he had been ignominiously expelled. But who was he that shared his triumphal car, his face wreathed in smiles? Ah, it was the man who dared to undergo obloquy and shame. If we suffer, we shall also reign with Him; if we deny Him, He will also deny us.

Christ's ultimate aim is, of course, to secure peace for our harassed world. He hath laid the basis of peace in his Cross; and the proclamation of the tidings of peace is already spreading through the world. How beautiful upon the mountains are the feet of those that publish peace. But the collision between his principles and those of human nature always produces war, antagonism, hatred. Not that He counsels strenuous resistance, the attitude of his subjects must be meekness, submission, resignation to the inevitable brunt of brute force, through which ultimately they must conquer; but in the earliest proof there will always be the cross, the spitting, the apparent defeat. The marvel, however, is that it is only through such experiences that the ultimate triumph of the principles of his Gospel is assured.

Young Christian, you will find your greatest difficulty will arise from the unconverted members of your own family. Often the sorrowful cry will be extorted, "Woe is me that I sojourn in Meshech, that I dwell in the tents of Kedar; I am for peace, but when I speak, they are for war." It is not necessary, like Joseph, to upbraid, or to carry an evil report. But the very presence of a Christ-like character in the midst of worldliness and self-seeking will inevitably arouse dislike and hostility. You cannot help it. Do not go out of your way to solicit hatred. Be consistent, kind, gentle, and Cain will hate Abel in the last family story, as in the first.

You will have to take your cross, which is not, as the world thinks, some special form of trial, but the total surrender of your own way and will, the persistent negation of the self-life, and the being willing to make Christ first, at whatever cost. Dear as the love and approbation of the home circle is, you must dare to forfeit these when the will of Christ is opposed to the practices and pleasures of your nearest and closest friends. You must not falter; you must not try to secure their goodwill by doing things that your Lord forbids; you must make Him first, come what may. And though it may seem that you are forfeiting the influence which you want to build up for their salvation, you will discover that the course which seems to forfeit it will really secure it, and lead to their salvation (v. 39). C.E. NOTES.

The total number of societies now registered in the Union of Great Britian and Ireland is 7,027.

The Annual Convention next Whitsuntide will be held at Sheffield. The programme promises to be as helpful as in previous years.

The London Council of Christian Endeavour are issuing a special letter to all societies urging them to do all in their power by prayer and individual effort in the forthcoming simultaneous Mission.

The Welsh C.E. Union has been carrying out a series of Extension Meetings in South Wales. That held at Pontypool was most helpful, and promises to result in pioneer work throughout the whole district. As a sequel to the meeting, a society was formed at the Mount Pleasant Congregational Church.

The Christian Endeavour Union of Paris has celebrated its third anniversary by a united meeting of the three English-speaking societies of which it consists. The speakers included Rev. Charles Greig, director of the McAll Mission of Paris; Lord Radstock, whose warm sympathy with Christian Endeavour in Paris has often been expressed; and Rev. Bramley Hart, pastor of the Wesleyan Church.

Dr. Clark has issued a call to prayer for a great awakening. He says: "Will you who read these words, whether members of the Society or not, unite with me in definite, persistent prayer for a deep, prevailing, wide-spread revival this winter? To make the suggestion definite, I would propose that for three months we seek to spend a few minutes each day in waiting upon God for this particular blessing. Why should not two, 200, 2,000, 200,000 of us be agreed as touching this thing? O friends, I feel, as I write, that God is putting in our hands the lever that, if we use it, will connect us with his limitless powerhouse."

International S.S. Lesson.

CHRISTMAS LESSON: Matt. ii. 1-11.

GOLDEN TEXT: "Thanks be unto God for his unspeakable Gift" (2 Cor. ix. 15).

INTRODUCTION.

FIND on the map of Palestine the town of Bethlehem, and read up Luke ii. 1-21 before teaching this lesson. In Luke the shepherds worship; in Matthew the wise men worship.

Key to Blackboard Plan.—The lesson is about the guiding star which led the wise men to the new-born Child. Jesus Himself is a Star (see Rev. ii. 28; xxii. 16). He will guide us (Num. xxiv. 17).

(A star might be cut out in silver paper, and the letters cut out in bright coloured paper and pasted on the star.)

1. THE LITTLE CHILD.

(5, 6) It is interesting to see how prophecy is fulfilled (Micah v. 2; Jer. xxiii. 5, 6). (15) Hos. xi. 1. As Joseph went to Egypt with Him (13), (23), and (17), both prophecies fulfilled.

How is it the Jews cannot see how clearly "all came to pass"? Their eyes seem still to be veiled. (2 Cor. iii. 15, 16). Picture the Baby-Boy as given us in our lesson with all the interesting points given in Luke.

2. THE WISE MEN.

Where are they from? Who are they? Why do they come? (1) From Persia. They were very clever and knew a great deal; they considered themselves to be a sacred caste of men; but although they were so wise and knew so much, they did not know Jesus, but they want to find Him. (2) They call Him "a King," and they have a fixed purpose in coming to see Him; it is to worship Him. (3) Herod is much disturbed; he does not like the idea of another King at all (4, 7, 8) but he will find out all about Him and then have Him killed. So thinks Herod, and we know the result. (10) Rejoiced, great joy. The same happens to-day. Any soul asking with all earnestness (2) "Where is He?" will find Him and joy will fill the heart (Acts viii. 37, 39).

3. THEIR GIFTS.

They worshipped and they gave Him of their best (11). The meanings to the gifts have been given as follows: Gold, symbol of Jesus as King (Psa. lxxii. 10, 11). Incense, symbol of Jesus as God (Matt. i. (3). Myrrh, symbol of Jesus as Redeemer (John xix. 39).

4. JESUS THE KING.

Born a King (v. 2); died a King (Matt. xxvii. 37); reigns a King (Rev. xix. 16). Have you made Him your King? Have you thanked God for his unspeakable Gift? Have you trusted in the Bright and Morning Star?

Livingstone College.

THAT the utility of courses of study in medicine, surgery, and hygiene is felt increasingly by workers in the foreign mission field is demonstrated by many evidences, one of which is the rapid development of the operations of Livingstone College.

The first public meeting in connection with the College since its incorporation was held on Tuesday evening of last week, in the auditorium of the United Service Institution, Whitehall, Mr. ELIOT HOWARD presiding. Some interesting were given by Dr. C. F. HARFORD-BATTERSBY, Principal, who spoke of the suitability of new premises at Knott's Green, of the wide circulation attained by the useful monthly magazine, entitled Climate, and of the many missionary organizations represented in the students who have taken advantage of the facilities afforded for study. The annual report recounts many instances in which the knowledge attained has proved useful in various parts of the world. For example, a missionary in China writes: "I dispense medicines twice a week. Some of the cases treated have been very successful, giving a good opportunity for preaching the Gospel, and showing also the practical side of it. Resulting from this, we have a few inquirers who first heard the Gospel when coming for medicine." A worker in the Canadian North-West says: "I have had good health since coming out, having well remembered instruction concerning entering new climates, new surroundings, and food, etc. This has, no doubt, PREVENTED MUCH ILL-HEALTH."

PARTICULARS OF PROGRESS

Another, writing from Peru, says; "I have found my knowledge of dentistry of great service, giving access to some who otherwise would not have listened to me."

During their course at the College, the students engage in medical mission work, which is now associated with the parish of St. James-the-Less, Bethnal Green (Rev. J. E. Watts-Ditchfield). A building has been adapted to provide a waiting-hall, dispensary, and two consulting-rooms; but up to the present time the Mission has been carried on in temporary premises in one of the poorest streets of the parish. In spite of the disadvantageous surroundings, a useful work has been done, and more than 7,000 attendances have been recorded during the year. The latest development is the "Traveller's Health Bureau," situated at 133, Salisbury Square, E.C. The Bureau has been established for the purpose of collecting and diffusing information concerning the needs of travellers.

The Chairman, in asking public support for the College, spoke of the ignorance which prevails so generally even as to the elements of medicine; at the same time it is not intended ito train men as "medical missionaries," (a term which is properly applied only to those possessing a medical qualification) but to give a knowledge of hygiene and surgery in the absence of proper medical skill.

Rev. D. M. PATTERSON (C.M.S.) testified from experience to the need for some medical training in North India, and to the value of the College, of which he is now a student. Rev. J. E. WATTS-DITCHFIELD gave a vivid account of the beneficial effects of the Medical Mission, which has awakened an interest in spiritual things in a district noted for turbulence and Sabbath-breaking. Words of gratitude for the help afforded to missionary societies were spoken by Mr. EUGENE STOCK, who, in giving the concluding address, said that, begun in a small way, the College is going on to great things, to the glory of God.

Pastors' College Anniversary.

DESPITE the heavy rain which was falling outside, the Metropolitan Tabernacle was looking its brightest last Thursday evening, the occasion being the annual meeting of the Pastors' College. The company present at tea crowded out the Lecture Hall. Pastor Thomas Spurgeon presided, and at the outset expressed his disappointment that his brother, Pastor Charles, was unable to be present on account of health; and that Pastor Saillens had been suddenly called to Paris by the serious illness of a friend. He expressed gratitude to God that in connection with the College there were no difficulties to chronicle, no distresses to report. There is still the same eager crowd waiting at the College portals, with applications coming in increasing numbers. All are earnest, and desirous to be devoted to the service of the King in the ministry. There is also a continuance of the same eager application from churches for the brethren.

Success in all spiritual work—especially that of soul-saving—follows the men who go forth. "Our brethren may fail in many ways, but they are second to none in earnest devotion to the Gospel of the grace of God. A practical exhibition of the spirit animating the present students was given in connection with special services held in the Tabernacle early in the year, and they are now volunteering to repeat the effort under the auspices of the Simultaneous Mission."

A MARTYR'S CROWN.

In connection with the Missionary Society, touching reference was made to the fact that a martyr's crown now belongs to the College. Mr. S. Frank Whitehouse, who went forth twelve months ago, and his wife, have since been called to seal their testimony with their blood in China. Of the Temperance Society, it was noted that all the students are members.

Principal McCaig also referred to the loss sustained in the death of Mr. Whitehouse, and spoke affectionately of the way in which his choice spirit had endeared him to all. The names and particulars were given of eighteen students who have been settled in the course of twelve months, bringing up the number of men who have been trained to 1,014. Of these 127 are dead, and other names have been removed from the list, leaving 784 now active in the work of the Lord, 693 of whom are pastors, missionaries, and evangelists in connection with the Baptist denomination. Since 1865, when statistics began to be noted, 132,015 believers have been baptized by such pastors, and the net increase in the membership of their congregations has been 105,564.

The students were represented by Mr. Ernest Debenham, who gave some of his impressions of the life and work of the College. While much importance is put on the lessons to be learned from great preachers, his testimony was clear as to the fact that Christ, and He alone, is held up as the great ideal for every preacher.

Pastor Spurgeon explained that there had been a considerable falling off in contributions for the work carried on by Pastor Saillens in Paris; and that the College Missionary Association has agreed to help by giving a Centenary Offering: £60 has been promised, but 1901 shillings are being aimed at.

At the close, a lecture on "Charles Haddon Spurgeon: Impressions and Recollections," was given by Rev. Dinsdale T. Young.

Protestant Alliance.—A large number of meetings have been held during the past week in connection with the Alliance, in various towns and villages throughout the country. Limelight lantern lectures have been given, and the attendances have been most encouraging. A feature of the work of the Protestant Alliance is the arranging and conducting of series of Protestant debates for the study of the Romish and Ritualistic controversy, which are being held in various sacerdotal districts.

N.E. London Gospel Mission.

THE all-round work undertaken by the N.E. London Gospel Mission and Lancing Homes of Rest was happily brought before a large number of friends and supporters at the annual meeting, recently held at Earlham Hall, Dalston.

There are five halls and rooms used in London for the labours of the Mission among the poor, including special provision for match-factory girls at Bow, and for gutter lads at Kingsland, while, apart from an active philanthropy, from each centre there radiates the light of the Gospel. Then there are sewing classes for widows, for whom, in age and infirmity, Mr. Chorley, the superintendent, finds a pleasant cottage home where they can end their days in peace, surrounded by Christian influences.

The Seaside Homes of the Mission have grown from year to year. Beginning just fifteen years since, with a tiny cottage in the suburbs, for a few of the more delicate children of the Sunday school, there are to-day, on the South Coast, three separate Homes, one of which is for men, and another for mothers and babies, making up as many as 160 beds, and where, during the three busier months this summer, 1,039 persons enjoyed a welcome rest. Poor ones were received, either free or at reduced charges, from more than twenty other missions and societies in London, while the number further included invalids from "the front," and the wives and children of reservists, also cripples, consumptives—both the halt and the blind.

Mr. John McCall said some very kind things about the work and the workers, and as he knew from practical aquaintance the Homes at Lancing, his testimony was the more valued. The fact was borne witness to with pleasure that not a few who have gone to Lancing have returned new creatures in Christ Jesus. One of these, sent by the daughter of the venerable Dr. Moffat, was a "miracle of grace." Short addresses were also given by Messrs. D. C. Apperly and J. E. Cheeseman, and by various workers of the Mission.

A selection of happy children from the Mission Sunday scholars (who number in all more than 1,200) were present and sang very sweetly, as also did our friends Mr. and Mrs. Baker, the blind evangelists, whose ministry will long be remembered.

Mr. Chorley reminded the friends that the present needs include the rebuilding of the older wing of the Women's and Children's Home at Lancing, which will entail an outlay of about £1,500. Mr. Chorley's address is 6, Clephane Road, Canonbury, N.

London Medical Mission.

THE London Medical Mission has been established for twenty-nine years in one of the most needy districts of the metropolis, namely St. Giles, which lies between Oxford Street and the Strand, and comprises Seven Dials and the many streets leading into it, also the various courts and alleys around Endell Street, Drury Lane, and Long Acre.

In addition we have a branch on the South side of the Thames at North Street, Lambeth, where the same work is actively carried on by an earnest staff of workers.

Every day we see the sick and suffering in their homes, prescribe for them, nurse them, and take the Gospel to them. We also send them nourishing food, properly cooked in our kitchen, and see that they are supplied with coal if they cannot afford to buy it, or if fires need be kept up in the sick room at night. Many are much in need of clothing and bedding, and when our cupboards are full, we can supply their wants.

In addition to the above, patients who are too poor to pay for medical aid are welcomed at the Mission twice a week, and get free medical help, and also have the Gospel preached to them. With prices going up, and rents expensive—with great difficulties from overcrowding and scarcity of dwelling-places—our poor have a hard time. Many have received spiritual blessing through the work, and numbers have been reached, and are being reached, who otherwise would never come under the sound of the Gospel. The next century must see medical mission work greatly extended all over the world. Prayerful sympathy will be much valued. The needs are great and increasing.

Last year we attended to over 8,300 different cases of illness, and nearly 16,000 visits were paid by doctors and nurses to the sick in their homes. A Convalescent Home for Women at Folkestone has been open nearly all the year, 250 having been received up to this time. Our Holiday House in the country for children has been a great boon again to many, but is now closed for the winter months.

The Work at Costers' Hall.

DURING the coming spring, Mr. W. J. Orsman, J.P., will complete forty years of active service on behalf of street traders and the poorer classes generally of the north-east quarter of London. Golden Lane, on the confines of the city, where the work commenced, has, meanwhile, undergone a transformation, the people who crowded its main thoroughfare and courts and alleys being driven further afield. A large proportion of the people migrated to Hoxton, where, accordingly, the present Costers' Hall was erected about twenty years ago. The locality is a poor and over-crowded area, very much in need of all that a comprehensive mission can do for it.

The Hall is open on every day of the week, and represents a fully-equipped working mission church of over 400 members. Ranking as honorary pastor, Mr. Orsman is assisted by about 140 voluntary helpers. The Sunday-school is as large as can be accommodated in the spacious building, and there are Bible-classes for young men and women, with many other agencies, including various clubs for the encouragement of thrift. The street-traders have rooms provided for them free of cost for the holding of their business meetings, which were formerly held at public-houses. The Sunday services in the large room—capable of seating 700 persons—are well attended. These are often conducted by Mr. Orsman himself, but frequently a preacher attends from the Evangelization Society.

During each winter Costers' Hall not only gives assistance to a large number of the deserving poor, but meals are given on several days a week to ill-fed children from the elementary schools, who are selected by their own teachers. On account of these, and also for general purposes, Mr. Orsman asks for funds. It may be added that the triennial donkey show, on behalf of the costers, was held last September. This show, founded by the late Earl of Shaftesbury and others, has had the result of greatly improving the condition of the animals used by street-traders throughout London. Mr. Orsman's address is Milton House, Shacklewell Green, N.E.

Schools for Bible Study.

THE West of England Schools for Bible Study, conducted by Mr. G. Soltau during the autumn months in Bristol, Bath, Clevedon, and Weston-super-Mare, and other centres, have proved exceedingly attractive to large numbers of Christian people. The attendances have been from 2,000 to 2,500 per week, varying with the weather. The Gospels, the Pentateuch, the Typical Character of the Lord Jesus, Character Studies, and the Holy Spirit have been handled in the various places, and much blessing from God has attended the work. The series closes this week.

The winter series is being arranged as follows, commencing on January 14:—Mondays, Eastbourne, hon. sec., Mrs. Tindall, 26, Enys Road. Tuesdays, Brighton, hon. sec., Miss R. Smith, 24, Stamford Road. Wednesdays, Hastings and St. Leonards, hon. sec., Miss Douglas-Dole, Holmesdale Gardens, Hastings. Thuredays, Tunbridge Wells, hon. sec., Miss Langton, 13, Calverley Park. Fridays, Richmond, hon. sec., Colonel Major, 102, Queen's Road. Full particulars of places of meeting and topics can be obtained from the secretaries.

Notes & Comments

OWING to the Christmas Holidays, we shall be compelled to go to press early with our next week's issue. Therefore urgent communications must reach us by Friday morning this week.

The last Christmas of the century is now upon us, and the humanitarian sympathies and social kindliness which mark the season are in full play. "Goodwill to men" is the motto of all who enter into the meaning of the festival. The earth is girdled with good wishes; flying messages are being swiftly carried from place to place, reminding their recipients of old friendships and happy memories of days gone by. Families whose members are scattered the rest of the year are once more reunited round the common board, and loving hearts beat high with the joy of renewed fellowship. But let none forget what it is that has made all this outbreak of love and goodwill possible. Christmas is the festival of Christ, and those who are entering into its social privileges are sadly ungrateful if they forget the Spiritual Fountain in the stream of social blessings which flows out of it. The angels' song was the true precursor of the Christmas bells.

During the high-tide of festivity that is now flowing, there are many families over which the loss of some dear one during the year will cast a gloom hard to bear in the face of the prevailing brightness. In particular this will be a sad day for many who have lost friends and relatives in the South African war. A kindly message, or a whispered word of comfort, will go a long way to help in such cases. The remedy for the loss of loved ones is more love from the friends that remain. Day by day, as the casualty lists come in from the front, the number of such families is increasing. Let them have warm places in the prayers and goodwill of God's people.

On Monday, Dr. Parker, at the invitation of the editor of The Sun, commenced a week's editorship of that journal. The experiment was entered into with a view of testing the possibility of producing an evening paper that should be free from the objectionable features of the cheap press, the articles being written from a Christian standpoint. It is too early at the time of writing, to forecast the success or failure of the enterprise, but the early numbers are, at any rate, free from extravagance of any kind, are healthy and serious in tone, as well as interesting and well-written. One conspicuous feature is the entire absence of betting news, the space usually occupied by that very objectionable department being devoted to quotations from Scripture against all forms of reliance on chance. The Christian public are appealed to to uphold the experiment, with a view of possibly establishing a Christian newspaper on a permanent basis. If the venture resulted in such an enterprise, it would be a national benefit.

The passages of Scripture which are quoted under the heading, "Betting and Gambling Forecasts," are as ingenious as they are weighty, as the following extracts attest :—

The Wages of Sin is Death. My son, if sinners entice thee, consent thou not.

If they say, Come with us . . . We shall find all precious substance, we shall fill our houses with spoil. Cast in thy lot among us; let us all have one purse. My son, walk not thou in the way with them, for their feet run to evil.

Blessed is the man that walketh not in the counsel of the ungodly, nor standeth in the way of sinners.

Wicked men they lay wait as he that setteth snares. They set a trap; they catch men.

After which the Doctor pertinently adds :—

I call upon all praying souls in London, and throughout the world, to pray that all gambling, which is a form of robbery, may perish out of the land. It eats like a cancer. If my paper cannot, during six experimental days, live without pandering to the gambler, the drunkard, and the sensualist, then let it wither away. The answer is with Christian men and women throughout the world.

The Bishop of Liverpool, in his recent Advent Pastoral, takes a somewhat gloomy view of the outlook in the present time of perplexity and distress. He says :—

When we look at our own land, we see indifference, impurity, intemperance, and the curse of gambling spreading on every side. The love of self has weakened and obscured faith in a living God.

But at the same time he sees—

A vast and growing population, with untold possibilities of good, waiting to be leavened with the spirit and teaching of Jesus Christ.

In face of these things, Dr. Chavasse does not waste words in empty generalizations, but goes on to urge the duty of the individual :

Before we pass on to meet the unknown future, let us pause and think. Let us look into our hearts and lives. Let us confess our sins. Let us thank God for our mercies. Let us pray for the heavenly assistance of the Holy Spirit, and let us renew the consecration of ourselves to God.

The Bishop of Worcester, with a view of utilizing more largely the rank and file of the members of the Church of England, has started the process of ordaining deacons on the condition that they are not to seek higher "orders." There is a further desire that those in such deacons' orders should be free from the rule which forbids clergymen to follow secular callings, so that ordinary business men might be able to perform many minor liturgical duties, serve gratuitously as deacon, "administer" the chalice, preach occasionally, and be a link between the regular ministry and commercial life to the great advantage doubtless of both. This is the first practical suggestion for the using up of the spiritual talent and devotedness so abundantly provided in the Church of England, but which has hitherto been hidden beneath the word "laity." In all our churches there is great scope for the full use of these reserves of the service.

The main-spring of the coming United Mission of the Free Churches is the recognition of the fact that Christianity is an aggressive faith, and that it is not enough to erect and open churches and mission-halls in the name of Christ: but that Christians must go forth to invite people in, that they may hear the Gospel. There is no greater hindrance to the evangelistic aspect of the Gospel than the blight of "respectability," which afflicts so many churches. When, as happens sometimes, any spontaneous exhibition of spiritual feeling in a church is considered in bad taste, when an effort to reach the outside masses is discouraged as disturbing the calm flow of the church life, and when the cultured and the educated members leave such efforts to those members of the fellowship who are more gifted with grace than intelligence—it is clearly needful that the movement should begin with a thorough conversion of the Church itself; otherwise the outsiders who come in will not be very happy. All ministers who are wishful to make the Mission a success, should carefully educate and prepare their people for this work.

One of the great perils of all teachers and preachers is to fall into a "rut," and so to make religion synonymous, in the minds of children and young people, with dulness. This is sometimes the result of confounding faithfulness to the few great essential truths with the futile repetition of a few select phrases. There is no more moving or pregnant phrase in the Bible, for instance, than this: "The blood of Jesus Christ cleanseth us from all sin;" and yet by repeating it mechanically often enough, it may become quite devoid of meaning to the majority of hearers. In fact, there is more ability and industry required to present familiar truths in a fresh setting than to be perpetually announcing novelties. The great preachers keep within well-defined limits as to the choice of their subjects; but they make these subjects perpetually fresh by their unexpected method of treatment, and the wealth of their illustration. The ideal preaching is thus "new as the foam" in its manner, and "old as the rock" in its substance.

At the Autumn Conference of the Society of Friends Temperance Union, held recently at Manchester, considerable prominence was given to the discussion of the subject of the attitude of the Churches in regard to the Temperance Movement, and there seems to have been a consensus of opinion that there is only too much room for greater earnestness, and more strongly combined effort. Undoubtedly the drink evil is one which calls pressingly for Parliamentary interference, but, as one of the speakers at the Conference urged, Christian men should not depend too much upon the probability of the desirable legislation being forthcoming, and ought not to relax their own individual efforts. Apart altogether from reformative work in localities, the foundation of a healthy and righteous public opinion as to the drink question depends almost entirely upon the labours of the individual Christian, and it is that educated public opinion which must, sooner or later, coerce the State into action.

The criminal statistics for 1899, just issued, reveal an alarming increase in the number of apprehensions for crime in Scotland. The number of persons involved during the twelve months was 176,524, being an increase of 10,621 over 1898, which itself marked an advance on all previous records. We are told that there is an absence of serious crime, and that is a satisfactory element in the matter but the thoughtful reader cannot help being saddened by the ever-increasing number of "drunks and disorderlies." Notwithstanding all the progress made by Christian and temperance organizations, the drink interest seems to be ever entrenching itself more firmly; and the result is summed up by a morning contemporary in the words:—

In the matter of sheer, besotted, over-mastering drunkenness, we stand without rivals, in shameful, isolation.

No doubt the Church is gradually awakening to the gravity of the case, but the enemy seems to become more aggressive, and the battle fiercer, as the years pass.

At the last Brewster Sessions, the Newbury magistrates requested the Licensed Victuallers of the district not to serve children under thirteen years of age with intoxicants. The publicans have now replied with a strong protest against the magistrates' recommendation, and decline to do as they were requested. They give curious reasons for their refusal. Of course they are "acting in strict accord with the law"—that goes without saying. But their benevolence leads them to protest against "a serious interference with parental discretion," which the carrying out of the recommendation would entail. While denying that any harm results from the visits of children under thirteen, the publicans consider that "a greater risk would attend the visits of children of fourteen years or older." It is quite touching to encounter this earnest solicitude for the rights of parents and the welfare of children! Despite their asseverations, however, all right-minded people who really love their country will not rest until the children have legal protection against an early schooling in the national shame.

Earl Grey's suggestion, made in a letter to The Times, for the acquisition and control of public-houses by Public-house Trust Companies, is not without its good points, if we assume the improbability of Parliament adopting and legalizing the Veto. No doubt it would be an advantage to remove the element of individual gain from the retail drink traffic, and to substitute for it the widened responsibility of a body acting in the public interest, so far as the expenditure of the drink revenue is concerned. But when all is said, the scheme is but a compromise, recognising vested interests where such do not exist upon any legal basis, and bolstering up a traffic which ought never to have been recognised and fostered by the State. The case is one not for companies, but for the controlling voice of the people.

Rev. J. W. Horsley, who for so many years was chaplain of Clerkenwell Prison, and who, therefore, has had a long experience in regard to crime and criminals, has recently expressed a very decided opinion that mere secular education has little if any effect in the diminution of crime. He attributes the falling off, which of late years has been evident so far as the more serious classes of crime are concerned, to the influence of the temperance movement, and to the wiser action which has led to greater leniency being show to juvenile and first offenders. Such a testimony cannot be gainsaid by those who would place a Scriptureless education in the first rank as a preventive of crime and immorality.

The Roman Catholic Bishops of Ireland have begun to realize the futility of demanding a State-endowed University for themselves in that country, and have just put forward a far more reasonable demand. At their last Synod at Maynooth, they asked, not for a Roman Catholic University, but for a common National University, which should preside over their higher studies, each college to share a common educational fund, according to the extent and quality of its work. With due safeguards against any abuse in the administration of this fund by the constituent colleges, this looks, on the face of it, a straightforward and feasible demand. It would place all the educational institutions of Ireland on an identical footing as regards the State, and encourage each to do its best work as regards their common purposes of education. If a wise and equitably framed scheme of this kind could be formulated, it might lay one of the most persistent and irritating ecclesiastical spectres of the time.

The call made through Parliament on the nation to provide £16,000,000 more for the expenses of the war, and the announcement of Mr. Brodrick that none of the soldiers now away from home in South Africa must be expected back till March at the earliest, has sent a wave of disappointment through the country, and brought home to the national consciousness what even the harrowing lists of dead, sick, and wounded from the front largely failed to do. Those who entered lightly into this conflict, on both sides, are now convinced of its stupendous character, and the unparalleled difficulties it presents to speedy pacification. At the same time, the not unnatural admiration excited by the bravery and self-sacrifice of the Boers, in carrying on a perfectly hopeless struggle, cannot exonerate them from criminal recklessness in continuing resistance long after all hope of final success must have fled. At present it is not so much a war as a series of raids and counter-raids, which cause immense suffering, loss of life, and destruction of property.

We have of late become somewhat familiar with the word Imperialism, and in the glamour of war, from which we are only now emerging, there is a great risk of overlooking, in the glare and triumph of conquest, the almost overpowering burden of spiritual and moral responsibility involved in our acquisition of fresh territory. In a notable utterance some time ago, Lord Cranborne exclaimed:

Perish the Imperialism which does not place the Imperialism of our Lord Jesus Christ in the forefront.

Only by making England the pioneer of the Christian religion shall we escape that decline and fall to which the great nations of history inevitably tottered in the blindness of their selfish and cruel aggrandisement.

The recovery of the Czar is matter for profound thankfulness. Though one of the youngest of the great Sovereigns of Europe, he has proved during his brief reign that he is a true lover of his people, with a high regard for their welfare, and that he is a passionate advocate of international peace. It is well known that he has been personally profoundly disappointed with the results of the Peace Conference at The Hague, and that his sensitive constitution is only too readily affected by mental stress. The end of that Conference, however, is not yet; its work is only just begun, and the coming century will prove its permanent value. It is certain, at any rate, that one of the greatest safeguards of peace is the personal influence of the Czar, and that with his recovery one of the beneficent influences in international politics will renew its sway. From such a noble-spirited ruler much may be expected, even in the direction in which Russia is most backward among European nations—religious toleration.

We beg attention to Mrs. Wall's pathetic appeal on behalf of the always suffering but now deeply distressed and homeless poor of Rome, the lower portion of which has been submerged by the recent unprecedented floods. Mrs. Wall has been for many years a mother to them. Let us help her.

In a recent official report in regard to Uganda, Sir Harry Johnstone pays a high and unsought-for tribute to the results of mission work in that interesting portion of the great African continent:

The rapid spread of Christianity over the kingdom of Uganda, and the district of Toro, is one of the greatest triumphs to which the advocates of Christian propaganda can point. It must not be imagined, of course, that the Baganda or Batoria have none of the old Adam in their composition, since they accepted Christianity, but, undoubtedly, their intelligence is quickened, their ideas are enlarged, and their harmful superstitions are swept away by their acceptance of the new faith. The difference between the Uganda of 1900, and the blood-stained, harassed, barbarous days of Mtesa, and his son Mwanga, is really extraordinary.

We once more put in a plea on behalf of a reasonable and humane rearrangement of the hours of business in shops, so that employées may be able to live a more natural life. In London the great majority of shops do not close before eight or nine o'clock, and some much later than this. This means that the assistants, for the most part, have no opportunity of attending classes, lectures, and services, at a reasonable hour. The mid-week half-holiday does not really meet the case, since it only gives one free night in the week. In certain of our Colonies, compulsory closing at seven o'clock is the rule. Why should it not be the same here? It would be an advantage in every way, and to all the parties concerned. Early closing all round would reduce the masters' expenses, while it would give the assistants the opportunity of self-improvement. Much of the late shopping indulged in by the public is due to thoughtlessness or selfishness—especially late Saturday shopping. The matter is really in the hands of the public at present, but as they do not seem to consider the weal of the assistants, it is time that the masters combined and agreed upon a common early hour of closing.

Gospel Foundations.

THE Holy Spirit is evidently reviving the interest of Christians in winning souls, and giving to the people a desire to hear and understand the Gospel. On the other hand, the reading and thinking of this generation is superficial, and the teaching which people receive is in many cases shallow and erroneous.

We have therefore thought it desirable to begin the New Century with a series of papers clearly and distinctly stating foundation truths. We are glad to say that the proposal has met with warm approval, and papers have been received or promised from Dr. Guinness Rogers, Canon R. B. Girdlestone, Dr. Handley Moule, Prebendary H. W. Webb-Peploe, Dr. Monro Gibson, Revs. F. B. Meyer, F. S. Webster, G. Campbell Morgan, Wm. J. Crosbie, Griffith Thomas, Jas. Douglas, and others.

The subjects treated of will be such as God, the Fall, Sin, Redemption, Conversion, Faith, Regeneration, Justification, Sanctification, Growth, Scripture, &c.

These articles will be printed weekly in leader type, and will occupy about two pages each. They will form an important body of Evangelical truth, and we hope that our readers will give us their kind and earnest help in extending their usefulness, first by prayer of the fervent sort that leads to effort, and then by commending The Christian to friends who are not at present readers of it.

The Magi at Bethlehem:

A CHRISTMAS MEDITATION.

THE Incarnation of the Son of God is the holiest and profoundest mystery of our Faith. It is the mother mystery of Christianity, for without it there could have been no human life of Christ, nor Crucifixion, nor Resurrection. Our hearts rest upon the person of the Saviour Incarnate for us men and for our salvation.

Every detail of the Saviour's entrance into his own world is precious to the Christian heart. Let us select at this time one item only for devout consideration, i.e., the mystery of our Lord's first manifestation to men.

Had He entered into the world with great state, that would have been in opposition to his usual manner of approaching men. God never comes to us with dramatic display, overcoming with astonishment a gaping world. He comes usually with calmness and gentleness, and without observation. When the Light of the World began to shine upon mankind from out the crib of Bethlehem, He gently pierced the darkness with silent shafts of light, gradually filling the human sky with his splendour. The many now rejoice in his strong shining, but the rising of the Sun was witnessed only by a few stray watchers.

And who were these to whom was granted the privilege of first beholding the infant Lord?—the representatives of ignorance and of science. The shepherds and the Magi represent these extremes. The former were Jews, and poor; the latter were Gentiles, and rich. But both found at the feet of the new-born King. All barriers of human construction break down in the presence of the Saviour, who unites all men to Himself. In the approach of science and ignorance to Christ, we behold a prediction of the ultimate triumph of Jesus Christ—when both simplicity and science, purified from all stain, shall render homage to Him from whom all true simplicity and science proceed.

Let us now bid adieu to the shepherds, reserving all our attention for the Magi, since they, being Gentiles, represent us better than do the shepherds. Four simple points will serve for our meditation.

I. God Called Them. Bethlehem would never have beheld them but for the leading of God's star. Their own wit could not have informed them of the coming of the God-man. Revelation alone could do that. Some of the wise men of our time have yet to learn that most elementary lesson of religion. Pure reason can lead men to the belief that there is a God, but revelation is required in order that we may know definitely what sort of a God He is, and how we may approach Him. The ladder from heaven to earth can not be erected from our side, it must be let down from heaven.

What star it was which led the Magi to Christ, need not trouble us. It accomplished its mission, and that is sufficient. The more important thing for us to note is that a star is placed in each man's sky to lead him to the Saviour. The Bible (chief of all), daily providences, various ministries, the voice of conscience, are all stars to lead us to Jesus. As certainly as God drew the Magi thus, so He draws each human soul to his Son. The star shines for each of us.

II. The Men Responded.—The call of God is in vain unless the human heart responds to it. Others besides the Magi, doubtless, beheld the star, but they alone followed it. In our time it is becoming a fashion to say nice and complimentary things about Jesus Christ. Many admire the leading star who never follow it. A mere complimentary religion is the deadliest of all snares for the soul. The star must be followed, if ever the Saviour is to become to us a personal reality. He who undertakes in faith the grand journey will never be deluded, for he will infallibly behold the Saviour, and be assured of his presence and love. But that great journey is not the easiest of pilgrimages. The Magi had many a weary march across the desert ere faith was rewarded with sight. Christ, however, is worth seeking, at whatever cost. The patience of those Eastern sons of certain men of our time who begrudge the slightest trouble in seeking Jesus.

The Magi found that society, as represented by Herod the king, did not favour their quest. At Jerusalem they lost the star, and not until they were out again on the high road, clear of the influence of Herod, did they recover its light. "Society" has always been against Christ, and it always will be, until He arises in his majesty and crushes its power for ever. He who starts out upon that glad journey to adore the Christ must understand, before he departs, that the modern representatives of Herod—the world power of the time—will always be against him. If they smile upon him for the time, it is only that they may betray his secret in order to slay it.

III. They Found Christ.—Their journey of faith, with its discouragements and weariness, was finally rewarded. The star led them to their true goal, and, having accomplished its mission, disappeared. How now will these God-led men act? Their caravan rests in the courtyard—the tinkling of the camel bells ceases, but the dusky sheiks wend their way to the house where are Jesus, Joseph, and Mary. With excited hearts they are at last in the presence of Him to whom God has drawn them from so far. They expect to see a babe, for they told Herod that He was but new-born. How do they act? There is no hesitation, their faith remains unwavering—they fall down at once, and adore the new-born King. The outward eyes beheld but a weak and helpless babe, but

THEIR FAITH BEHELD A KING.

Gladly they anticipated his triumph, and promptly offered to Him their homage. O wondrous faith! men mock what they call thy "superstition," and belittle thy greatness, but how royally dost thou smile at their littleness and want of perception! The eyes of faith are cleared by the touch of God, and they can perceive royalty where others see only meanness. Happy Magi! men of faith drawn by God to the manger of his Son. They in turn beckon us to follow Jesus and to adore Him. Happy we, if we also have followed the star and come to offer our homage to the Divine Son.

Christmas has returned once more, and the star is still shining, but who follow it? The many? There is a hum of many voices, the streets are uncommonly busy, lights are flaring everywhere, all the world is preparing for a great feast. In whose honour is all this? They say it is the anniversary of the Incarnation—but who would dream of it unless he were told? For the many, Christ is out of the feast: it is a banquet without the chief Guest—a relic of something that once upon a time possessed meaning. It is good to have the feast, to welcome our friends, to feel the pulse of gladness beat more strongly. But the world will observe its feast, and forget the Christ. Would God it might be a real Christmas, with the Saviour as Guest at every banquet. The spirit of Bethlehem is with us still, albeit the few only seem to be aware of it. They, however, who have followed the star and found the Saviour will sing their Adeste fideles, and pay their homage to the Saviour King.

To the homage of the heart we must add the homage of the estate. The Magi adored Christ, and then they offered to Him their presents—gold, frankincense, and myrrh. An empty-handed devotion is no real devotion at all. The surrender of the heart must always be followed by

THE SACRIFICE OF THE POSSESSIONS.

What in our life answers to gold, frankincense, and myrrh, must cheerfully be offered to Him from whom we have derived all our good. There are many poor in the world this Christmastide who belong to "his body"; an offering to them for his sake will be accepted as done to Him. And there are many others morally poor to whom, for Christ's sake, we owe it to present the inestimable treasure of the knowledge of Christ.

IV. The Magi were drawn, they came, they beheld, they adored, and they offered presents. Then, adds the sacred writer, "they returned to their own country another way." They might not return to Herod, the avowed enemy of Christ; the secret must be guarded from such as he. They were not permitted to spend their days at Bethlehem in contemplation. They must resume the old life, but in a new spirit. Life could never again be the same thing to them as formerly, after they had once seen the Saviour. It is so with all who have ever beheld Jesus by faith. The moments of rapture are succeeded by a return to our own country. We in the home circle and in the business sphere; we pick up the thread of life again and go on with our weaving, but we go back to that old, familiar life by another way. We came from our country to Christ by the way of weariness, hope, and fear. We return to it by the way of peace, joy, and full assurance. And the people who remained in the old country, refusing to follow the star, and reproaching those who did follow it, will await our return, and they will see by the new light that has come into life, that we have indeed found the Saviour. God grant that they, too, may follow the Divine Light, until it brings them to Him who is our God, our hope, and our all.

Challenge the Darkness.

"Moses drew near unto the thick darkness where God was" (Exod. xx. 21).

Challenge the darkness, whatsoe'er it be—
Sorrow's thick darkness, or strange mystery
Of prayer or providence! Persist intent,
And thou shalt find Love's veiled sacrament:
Some secret revelation, sweetness, light,
Waits to waylay the wrestler of the night.
In the thick darkness, at its very heart,
Christ meets, transfigured, souls He calls apart.

A Pathetic Memorial.—Rev. D. H. and Mrs. Lee—who were deprived of their family of four girls and two boys by a terrible disaster at Darjeeling last year—are now engaged in the work of rescuing and protecting young girls in Calcutta, fitting them for useful service as Bible-women, &c. It has been decided to erect a suitable building, estimated to cost £4,000. For further information application may be made to Mr. F. T. Lewis, 3, Aubert Park, Highbury, London, N.

Christmas Temptations;

OR, "A FRIEND IN NEED."

EDWARD JONES was going his round with letters, for the third time that day. The afternoon was settling down cold, and chill, for it was Christmas Eve. The work had been very heavy, letters and parcels for almost every house, and Edward had scarcely had time for his meals; he was feeling very tired, and beginning to think to himself, "I can't work like this without having something to drink; if they ask me at the next public-house, I shall say 'Yes.' I'm tired and dry; it's no use me trying to be a teetotaler;" for Edward had signed the pledge six months before at a temperance meeting.

He had not been a great drinker, but had used drink pretty freely. He missed it a good deal when he first became an abstainer, but was now beginning to feel the benefit of teetotalism, alike in health, pocket, and home comfort. But to-day the work was heavy, and being Christmas time he had been offered drink several times. Up to the present he had managed to resist temptation, but at length, as we have seen, he had made up his mind to accept the next offer.

Just then he turned into another street, and could see "The Carpenters' Arms" in the distance. They would most likely ask him to drink; they had often done so before. At this moment Mrs. Green, who lived at No. 63, rose and went to the window to lower the blinds. She stood a moment watching the passers by, then turned to her daughter, saying, "Amy, here is the postman coming down the street; he has got a load; we must have a cup of tea ready for him." "Yes," replied her daughter, "I will pour out a cup, for he will have no time to wait."

By this time "Rat tat" was heard at No. 62. So Amy went to the door. and opened it just as the postman was running up the steps. "I thought, perhaps, you would like a cup of tea this afternoon," she said. "Oh! thank you, miss; I shall be very glad of it," he answered. The tea was soon swallowed, and Edward continued his round, saying to himself, "Thank God for that; I can do without the drink now."

When Edward Jones reached home that evening, tired, but with brain and conscience clear, and told his wife of his temptation, and the kindly deed that had saved him at the critical moment, her heart was full of gratitude to God, and she resolved that she would be a help to others in a similar way, so far as lay in her power.

Mrs. Green never knew that her cup of tea was more than a passing cheer to Edward Jones; but in the great Hereafter she will have her reward. The little tale is told, that others may be encouraged to "go and do likewise," and at this festive, but testing, time to many, think of the postmen, telegraph boys, policemen, and, indeed, all others who may be exposed to special temptation. Junior Civil Service Christian Union.—This useful organization exercises a helpful influence in Government offices. Meetings are held on the third Tuesday in each month at 5.30 p.m., in the Parlour at Exeter Hall. The meetings are addressed by special speakers, and are open to all Civil Servants, whether belonging to the Union or not. Branch gatherings are held in some of the offices. The branch meeting for the city office is held on the first Thursday of every month, at 5 p.m. at the Y.M.C.A., 186, Aldersgate Street, E.C. The organ of the movement, The Union Observer (1d.), may be had from Mr. Goodrich, 52, Winsham Street, West Side, Clapham Common, S.W.

"Putting off the Armour" is the title given by the London City Mission to their annual record of the distribution of the fund for the relief of disabled missionaries, their widows and orphans. Sixty-two veterans and their dependents, in all 200 persons, are provided for from this fund, through the benevolence of Christian friends. The report contains pages of information concerning the aged pensioners—their past labours and present position—and will doubtless appeal to readers who are enriched by the bounties of God's providence, and are desirous of expressing their gratitude by showing mercy to others. Copies will be gladly forwarded by the secretary of the Fund, Mr. Jas. Dunn, 3, Bridewell Place, London, E.C.

Intercessory Prayer,

Linked with Individual Effort.

BY MR. THOMAS HOGBEN,
"WELCOME MISSION," PORTSMOUTH.

IN his very helpful little tract, entitled "How can the individual soul approach to God?" Professor Handley Moule says: "Fashions of thought are largely abroad which call for a temperate but firm re-assertion, now and again, of the individualistic aspect of the spiritual life; otherwise, even its collective interests will suffer. . . . Who does not know that strong and manifold drifts of opinion around us set towards all that is corporate and collective? They touch and draw us, like the secret currents of the ocean, in every kind of connection—social, civil, and religious. In religion, the tendency is everywhere in one mode of it or another."

It was to impress this truth upon the members of the Church of Christ that the "One by One Working Band" was founded some twelve years ago. It consists of Christians of all denominations, who, seeing the need for a revival of pure and undefiled religion, are united, by definite prayer and personal effort,

TO BRING SOULS TO CHRIST.

Thousands have tested its value, and many of the most unlikely have learned how to "take the prey from the hand of the mighty." We believe that upon the lines of the one-by-one method is marked out in the near future a glorious victory for the whole Church. However many may be won by the public preaching of the Gospel, when the great unused forces of the Church are sent forth, in the power of the Holy Ghost to win friend and foe, much more will be done.

As it is one of the great principles of the Protestant faith that no one has the right to come between the soul and the Redeemer, so it is one of the great principles of the Gospel that the one great business of every saved person is to seek and bring others to the Saviour. The New Testament is a striking record of how God called, saved, and equipped individuals. The majority of Christ's Apostles were called one by one; and immediately Andrew and Philip heard the call, they went, one in search of his brother, and the other of his friend.

Professor Moule says: "The incidents of the Acts are perpetually individualistic—the eunuch in his carriage, Cornelius in his chamber, Lydia by the river. Above all, we have Saul of Tarsus, the man chosen by the Spirit to contribute a third of its contents to the New Testament, and to develop all that is most comprehensive and collective in the message of our salvation."

United Prayer:

A SUGGESTION AND AN EXAMPLE.

AT a deeply interesting gathering of the Christian workers of Glasgow, held under the presidency of Lord Provost Chisholm, and which I was privileged to address, a card was distributed, on which the following words were printed:—

While Christians in many lands are agreeing to unite in special prayer, in view of the new century, a number of religious organisations have suggested to their members that, from December 2, 1900, to January 13, 1901, they should continue in believing and importunate prayer for the increased purity, spirituality, and power of the Church of Christ; and for the advancement of the work of God in all the earth. You are heartily invited to take part in this concert of prayer.

The proposal, I understood from my Scotch friends, originated in America. But, no matter from what human source it came, it is evidently of God; and earnest Christians everywhere will, doubtless, gladly and thankfully fall in with it, and consecrate the remaining weeks to supplication for the Holy Spirit that, with the new century, may begin a new era of religious progress. Preaching to Save.

THE revival in Wales in 1858-9 was the most powerful ever known in the Principality. Very many thousands were added to the churches—over 5,000 in Cardiganshire alone within six months. The awakening spread over all Wales, and almost every locality was influenced by it.

It began through Humphrey R. Jones, a young man from the neighbourhood of Aberystwyth, who went to America, and after his conversion was impressed to go to the different chapels among the Welsh-speaking people in America. His preaching had such influence wherever he went, that hundreds professed to be converted. The following summer he returned to the land of his birth, and was greatly blessed to a minister, Mr. David Morgans, who, in the same power, went forth preaching throughout Wales, and the effect was wonderful. Other ministers had a like blessing, and went forth in the same spirit, so that many thousands were added to the churches.

Last summer I saw a letter written by Mr. Humphrey R. Jones to a young preacher, and I translated it into English. I think it may be a means to stir up other young men to a similar ministry.

Llanelly. DAVID E. JONES.

EXTRACTS FROM LETTER.

Trerddol, July 16, 1858.

DEAR BROTHER,—I understand that you were at Taliesin [a village near Trerddol] last Sunday, and great was my joy when told of your method of preaching, and how you aimed to reach the conscience. I would very much like to have an hour or two with you, that I may tell you my mind, how to become A TRULY SUCCESSFUL PREACHER.

First, is to be much alone with God in prayer, many times a day. Be urgent, and ask the Lord in faith what to say to the people. Go each time straight from the chamber to the pulpit, like Moses from the mount to the camp. Then the unction will accompany your speaking; and every word that you will utter, will be received as from the angel of God. Preach pointedly and convincingly, and aim each time to reach the conscience. Tell the people of their sins, in their faces. Take no heed as to the people's good or bad opinion of you, but seek to have a conscience void of offence towards God and man, and avoid to make show of yourself in any of your discourses. I seek to attain and preaching: first, to have myself out of sight; next, never to say anything to amuse. I endeavour to preach each time as if I were to go from the pulpit to appear before God. If we are not in this condition, we shall be of very little good.

TWO THINGS WHEN PREPARING

My dear brother, let us, as two young men, live close to heaven; live so godly that our fear be on all, not saying a disrespectful word of anyone or anything, except the devil and sin. Think well of all Christians in all the denominations, and love his image in all, remembering that we are of the same Father, and all brothers in Christ, having been regenerated by the one Spirit, belonging to the same family, feasting at the same table, washed in the same fountain, travelling the same road, being led by the same pillar towards the one eternal home. Although I do not belong to your denomination, yet I love all God's people among them as much as those among us. If you are to be owned of God, then

PREACH TO THE CHURCH FIRST.

It will be of little use to preach to the world before the church be first awakened.

I understand that you are a student in college, preparing for the ministry. I hope that you will come out having more of the image of heaven on you than when you went in.

—Yours in the best of bonds,

(Signed) HUMPHREY R. JONES.

London City Mission.—The Ayahs' Home is one of the most recent, as well as useful, additions to the work of the London City Mission among foreigners. During the nine months since its opening at Hackney, between seventy and eighty of these women have been cared for and sheltered while waiting for a fresh engagement. Most of them pay something towards their own support, but not sufficient for the maintenance of the institution; hence contributions towards the Home will be welcomed.

Home Missions.

The Darkest England Scheme.

THE Salvation Army has issued a report of its social work in the United Kingdom for the past year. Taken as a whole, the review unfolds a record of successful dealing with the outcast, criminal, and poverty-stricken members of the community. The report takes the form of a series of thrilling stories from life, in which the facts speak for themselves.

Here is an extract from "A Philosophic Dosser"—one of the

who find shelter every night in the Army's London institutions, and who, though in such lowly circumstances himself, has a son in business on the Stock Exchange:—

The difference between the ensign (the officer in charge of the shelter), as you call him, and the lodging-house keeper is this: the Army man looks at you from the point of view, "What can I do for you?"—the lodging-house boss from the other point, "What can I get out of you?" Then, this place is clean, which to a man of my taste is worth a lot. If I have a taste for a warm spray, as well as a good shampoo, then I can get the same for nothing when I like. These are all silver streaks.

Another chapter shows how these destitute "humans"—victims either of sin or misfortune—are elevated and restored once more to places in society. In the case given, a man falls from the position of a broker to a sleeper-out in Hyde Park; but the Gospel of "beef, work, system, and the Grace of God" has landed him in a respectable situation in an accountant's office. More pitiable still are the tales of criminal life. An old man of seventy, who is likely to end his days in the Prison-Gate Home, entered the service of the East India Company at a comparatively early age, and afterwards became a "soldier of the Queen." Returning to England, he could get no employment. So he took to a life of crime, pocket-picking and burglary being his line. He was not long at the business before he found himself

IN THE CLUTCHES OF THE LAW.

In all he has served sentences aggregating twenty-four years. He turned his steps in the direction of Argyle Square, entered the Home, became soundly converted, and now fills an honourable and useful position.

The section of the report dealing with the work of the Boys' Home has a distinct bearing on the Hooligan question; and on the Farm Colony the same satisfactory process of man-making and character-regaining is progressing. It is in the Women's Rescue Work that a specially pathetic side of life appears. The testimony of a clergyman's daughter beguiled and betrayed, who alas! was only rescued to die, is touching in the extreme:—

I tell you I am convinced that no girl deliberately sets out to be bad. It is when her pearl of purity has been stolen from her that she grows reckless. What is there left to care for then! I was weak. And yet I struggled. I did not sell my soul all at once. But I sold it.

The Salvationists cared for me with a pitying love I never expected to find on earth for one so vile as I. Such love is not of earth; it is of heaven. And here I learned the full meaning of the confession my girlish lips had often formally repeated in my father's church, "We have erred and strayed from thy ways like lost sheep."

Thousands of girls have been thus sheltered and

and are to-day in respectable situations, and endeavouring to assist the agency by whose instrumentality they themselves have been saved.

Coming to the more general phase of the scheme, some idea of its magnitude may be gained from a glance at the statistics. From these figures we learn that nearly two-and-a-half million meals have been supplied at the Cheap Food Depots; 1,567,562 lodgings provided for the homeless; 11,282 applications for employment registered at the Labour Bureaux; 3,042 men received into factories; temporary or permanent employment has been found for 9,476; 525 ex-criminals received into Homes, 182 of whom were restored to friends or sent to situations; 3,569 applications dealt with for finding lost persons, 1,216 of whom were found; 2,460 women and girls received into Rescue Homes, 2,135 of them having been restored to their friends or sent to situations. In addition to this, multitudes of poor sick people were visited and nursed or otherwise cared for.

The additional Homes, or "Metropoles," which have been established in London, Plymouth, Bristol, Sheffield, and Dundee, bring up the total of institutions connected with the Darkest England Scheme in Great Britain alone to 142. In other lands there are, as an outgrowth of the scheme, 411 similar establishments, distributed over forty-seven countries and colonies, making a total of 553 agencies.

The report, with statement of accounts and balance-sheets, may be obtained from the head offices, 101, Queen Victoria Street, London. E.C.

Hyde Park Hall Mission.

MR. CHARLES COOK is approaching the thirtieth anniversary of open-air work, and completing his twenty-seventh year in Hyde Park Hall. It is a record of singular persistency and energy in aggressive enterprise. Recently, on the closing night of the Park services, one of the most interesting cases dealt with was a young man from Northern Europe. If, as is believed, the Lord gave him grace to accept the gift of God, he represents the twenty-ninth nationality to which converts of the work have belonged. Mr. Cook writes to us:

"We are more than ever convinced that if the people are to be reached, there is no place like the open air in which to get at them. I judge that both at our Sunday and week-night meetings fully 80 per cent. are the unsaved and the careless. We are thankful that Hyde Park Hall is close to the Park gates, and at the close of every meeting the anxious follow in, and, seeking to "strike while the iron is hot," we constantly

SEE DIRECT AND DEFINITE RESULTS.

"Here for twenty-seven years we have borne our testimony to the glorious old Gospel, and from here have gone forth not only foreign converts to witness in their own lands, but others whilst labouring with us now, are living Christ before their parents, who are gradually being weaned from the superstitions of Rome by seeing the truth lived out before them. Just now we are rejoicing over many who have been restored and converted in our large theatre in the Edgware Road. Many young people—children, and brothers and sisters and nieces of our workers have lately been gathered in. Madame Annie Ryall has been with us for a month, and much good has resulted from her consecrated labours. No one seems to sing like her, and we could wish that others may be raised up.

"Mr. Van De Venter is coming to us for January, and with his chalk talks to children, and his awakening words to adults, we are expecting great things. We value the prayers of God's people and seek an interest at the Throne of Grace. Very large audiences assemble at the theatre, and though the meetings have been continued for twenty-six years, the interest does not slacken. The blessing still continues, and souls are continually being brought to Christ.

"Hyde Park Hall is in need of refurnishing, in measure, and cleaning up generally. I should be glad to close the year free of debt, and should be grateful to my friends for fellowship and help to enable me to do this."

Mr. Cook's address is—6, Frithville Gardens, Shepherd's Bush, London, W.

Having seen and known our friend's work for many years, and conversed with large numbers of his converts, we have no hesitation in commending it, and endorsing his appeal.

The Rescue Society.

THE work of the year now closing has been one full of encouragement and cheer. At each of the seven homes there has been a distinct work of grace in the hearts of some of the inmates, and the spiritual fruit of the daily seed-sowing has greatly gladdened the heart of the workers. In some Homes this has been more manifest than at others. The letters received from those in service have also been most pleasing, and have frequently called forth hearty praise to God.

Only this morning the writer read a letter from one, a bright, happy, Christian girl, whose sister died in the Lock Hospital, and whose own past has been most sad. She has a difficulty in retaining her situation, owing to failure of health, but she writes so gratefully of the help she has received, and begs for aid for one whom she has met who is an orphan, only nineteen years of age, and quite respectable, but unable to work owing to consumption.

The applications lately have been unusually numerous, and everyone suitable has been received. Amongst those of this week are the following:—

R. J. She answered an advertisement for a servant, and came to London from the North, and was taken to lodgings, thence to a situation. In three days she was dismissed, and taken back to the office of the association whose advertisement she answered, she was turned adrift in London without a penny or a friend. She is now happily and safely cared for, and will be given a fresh and better start.

S. R. was turned out of home by her drunken mother when only 15 years old. She got a situation but did not keep it, and went to other places. Then her mother came, took away some of her things, and pawned them for drink. The girl drifted into a life of sin; she is now in the Home, and has a good prospect.

E. K. is only sixteen. Her mother is dead, and her father deserted her. She has tried to support herself in four different factories, but was found homeless, friendless, and half starving, asking for money for a night's lodging. She is now in a Preventive Training Home.

All the Homes are in good working order, and fresh admissions are coming in every day, but the funds are more than exhausted, and several hundreds of pounds are needed before the end of the year. C. STUART THORPE,

Secretary.

Hampshire Village Mission.

IN connection with this useful organization evangelistic work is conducted in Hampshire and the southern counties. Mr. J. H. CHARLTON reports that during the past year much blessing has been given. In addition to a mission van, a tent has been used with good effect. The tent was erected in five needy villages, and the people attended in large numbers. In some instances entire families have been brought to the Lord, and a number of requests have been received asking that the work may be continued during the winter.

Mr. Charlton adds: "The letters received from young converts have been most encouraging. We have had to keep up a continuous correspondence with them to satisfy their longing for teaching. Some of them have become soul-winners. Since the end of September, we have held a number of missions in barns, in places of spiritual destitution, where there is no Gospel preaching whatever. Our 'door-to-door' ministry has also been owned of God among the aged and the sick."

Mr. Charlton's address is the Mission Depot, Farcham, Hants.

Portrush.—A movement has been set on foot by the Irish Christian Workers' Union at Portrush for the erection of a hall for undenominational evangelistic work. The summer visitors to the town increase in number every year, and various evangelists have had their testimonies richly blessed through preaching by the seaside. A sum of about £500 is required. Further information will be gladly given by the secretary, Mr. Fred Charlton, Portrush.

A Prophetic Conference.

CONFERENCES for the study of the "Sure Word of Prophecy" have not been so frequent of late, but the annual one held in Birmingham, keeps on its steady way. Rev. G. S. Walker, Vicar of Christ Church, Summerfield, is the soul of the Conference, which was held in the Friends' Meeting House, Priory Rooms, Old Square, on December 4-6.

Rev. J. G. Gregory, of Leamington, was the speaker on the first morning and afternoon. In the morning he dwelt upon the fact and manner of Christ's advent. From Christ's own promise, and inspired apostolic statements, the fact of his return was proved. In the afternoon the same speaker dwelt upon the object and signs of the Lord's coming. The Lord's object will be to take his people to Himself (1 Thess. iv. 13-18), and the signs referred to were:—(1) Increased means of transit (Dan. xii. 4); (2) Growth of knowledge (Dan. xii. 4); (3) Preaching of the Gospel as a witness (Matt. xxiv. 14); (4) Times of the Gentiles nearly run out (Luke xxi. 24); (5) Spiritualism (1 Tim. iv. 1); (6) Formalism (2 Tim. iii. 5); (7) Historic facts in relation to the JEWS RETURNING TO THEIR OWN LAND.

There were two speakers on Tuesday evening. The first was Rev. S. Wilkinson. He mentioned three facts in relation to Israel: (1) There will be no national blessing to Israel apart from the land of Palestine; (2) this blessing will not come to Israel till they are converted; and (3) that blessing will not be known till Christ's return. Pastor F. E. Marsh followed with an address upon "The Difference between Christ's Coming for and with his People." (1) Different in character. The one in grace, and the other is in judgment. (2) Different in manner. The one is secret, and the other manifest. (3) Different in place. The one is in the air, and the other on the earth. (4) Different in time. The one is before the great tribulation, and the other after. (5) Different in purpose. The one is to gather his own to Himself, and the other is to punish his enemies. (6) Different in dispensation. The one is at the commencement of the Day of Christ, and the other at the Day of the Lord. (7) Different in relationship. He comes to his waiting people to complete their redemption, and He comes with his people

TO A WAITING CREATION.

The above two brethren were the same speakers on Wednesday morning. Mr. Wilkinson gave an account of the Zionist Movement, and the distribution of the Hebrew New Testament on the Continent. One item of interest was, no one is allowed to preach the Gospel in Russia, but permission may be obtained to sell the Hebrew New Testament, or any other book, and its contents may be explained. Pastor Marsh gave a detailed exposition of Romans xiii. 11, 12.

Rev. G. D. Hooper, of Bournemouth, gave a helpful exposition of the Book of Obadiah on Wednesday afternoon. He divided the book into three sections. Verses 1 to 9, the judgment of Edom fulfilled in history; verses 10-16, God's reasons for their doom; and verses 17-21, the future blessing to the seed of Jacob—the Kingdom, the Lord's.

The same speaker in the evening dealt with "The Work of the Messenger" (Mal. iii. 1-6), showing the promise of the return of the Messenger of the covenant; the purpose of his coming—judgment; and the performance, to be achieved in the land of Palestine.

Pastor Marsh, in the closing address on Wednesday evening, called attention to a sevenfold attitude which should characterize the believer in relation to the Lord's coming. He should: (1) Believe it thoroughly (1 John ii. 3 R.V.). (2) Love it tenaciously (2 Tim. iv. 8). (3) Work for it heartily (Luke xix. 13, R.V.). (4) Look for it intently (Phil. iii. 20). (5) Confess it constantly (Heb. x. 23, R.V.). (6) Pray for it earnestly (Rev. xxii. 20). (7) Prepare for it instantly (1 Pet. i. 13).

On the last day of the Conference Mr. Hooper gave the address in the morning, on "The Redemption of the Purchased Possession" (Eph. i. 14), and called attention to four points. (1) What is the possession? The Church (Acts. xxii. 28). (2) The Redemption (Rom. viii. 23). (3) When He will redeem—at his coming (1 Thess. iv. 15-17; 1 Cor. xv. 15-52). (4) How He will redeem—by his power (Phil. i. 20).

In the afternoon and evening, Dr. C. Rumfitt spoke upon the "Names on the Gates of Pearl," and "The Steps of Abraham's Faith; a Model and a Forecast."

The closing address of the Conference was given by Rev. E. Brewer on "An End—The End" (Ezekiel vii. 6). The Conference was a time of profit to many.

Kingsdown Orphanage.

FACTS and figures set out in the annual report of this institution bear testimony to its capacity to meet the demands which are made upon the Homes from time to time. In this record we read: "Within the Homes the year has been one in many respects calling for thanksgiving. Not one death has occurred, and in the three households, with their 176 occupants, only two cases of what may be termed serious illness. During this time thirty-one children (seventeen girls and fourteen boys) have been received, and of these seven were under four years. Of the thirty-two passed out eight (chiefly boys who had reached the age limit) were passed on to other institutions; seven returned to relatives in a position to keep them; eight girls went out to service (each being supplied with an outfit); and others were taken by their mothers, who had re-married."

Few can fully realize what

really means to those who assume the position of mother in each household—the varied calls and constant strain, the bright words of cheer to the forlorn little ones, the quiet talks of higher things, one day a word of comfort to the widow leaving her child at the Home, the next a prayer with the girl going out alone into the world, and sleepless nights of anxious watching over the sick bed.

A few particulars of some of the inmates of the institution speak for themselves:—

Rosie—suffering from curvature of the spine, was admitted to Cuthbert in October, 1899. Father accidentally drowned, and the mother, in order to support herself and four children, had to be absent at work until midnight. The child greatly needed careful attention, better nourishment, and fresh air. Matron's report seven months later:—"Rosie has wonderfully improved. She has now the face of a bright, happy child, instead of a little old woman."

Willie—left without father or mother, dependent on an aunt, herself a widow with three children, one of whom was already in the Pemberton Gardens Home.

Frank—a son of one of Mrs. Ginever's first girls who left the Home some years before, and subsequently married. The death of her husband left her with five children to support.

The institutions are at Pemberton Gardens and Tremlett Grove, Upper Holloway, London, N.; and Cuthbert House, Broadstairs. The secretary is Miss Wenborn, 35, Pemberton Gardens, N.

Free Dinners for School Children.

MISS PENNINGTON, hon. sec. Free Dinner Fund, writes to remind our readers of the needs of little, habitually underfed children in London Board Schools. Their want is likely to be sharp this winter; a wet season is almost as unfavourable to labour as frost and snow. Coal and provisions are dear, and home charities have found, almost invariably, their funds lessened by the war. Many a friend of education is striving to bring home the great truth that it is a matter of Imperial concern to tend, train, and teach our poorest children, gathered into the elementary schools. Copies of the report will be gladly sent. Communications to Miss Pennington should be addressed 16, Crossfield Road, South Hampstead, N.W.

With Christian Soldiers.

PROGRESS all along the line, as the outcome of earnest work among the members, continues to mark the career of the Soldiers' Christian Association.

The annual convention held on Wednesday last, at Exeter Hall, was no whit behind its predecessors in blessing and enthusiasm. The morning was devoted to a praise meeting, and a devotional address by Rev. W. R. Mowll. In the afternoon there was a large rally of members for the workers' testimony meeting, at which Major-General J. P. Battersby presided.

The central part of the auditorium was occupied by soldiers, in the uniform of their respective regiments. After an encouraging address from the chair, came words of testimony from workers lately

RETURNED FROM THE SEAT OF WAR.

Mr. J. Stewart gave a vivid account of ten months' evangelistic experiences. He found many openings, and spoke in high terms of the tent equipment provided. These canvas homes found favour among the troops for purposes of reading and writing, while in the evenings crowds of the men attended the Gospel meetings, and there were many instances of blessing. Proceeding, Mr. Stewart briefly described the onward march to Bloemfontein, and spoke of the sickness in that city—where no fewer than 600 men died in a month—and of the feeling of solemnity which rested upon many of the soldiers. Many, both of the British and Colonials, were spiritually impressed.

Mr. R. Fleming, who followed, has been labouring in Natal. He spoke with mingled vivacity and pathos of the effects of Gospel preaching among the Hussars, and showed also that the Association had been instrumental in alleviating the terrible sufferings of the wounded in the hospital at Ladysmith. At the evangelistic meetings there were large attendances, the Spirit of God strove mightily with the men, and there were many inquirers.

Mr. Denman had been at Stellenbosch, a remount camp where some thousands of men were continually coming and going. Through the kindness of the commanding officer, meetings were commenced, and a spiritual awakening followed. Mr. Denman detailed one case of a sergeant, the who was brought to the Lord. His father and mother and other relations in the old country were praying people, and very shortly he received a letter from England informing him that his wife also had become a Christian.

Two-minute testimonies from home workers followed Mr. Denman's address, and the various speakers brought good tidings from many centres. At North Camp, Aldershot, a branch has been formed, and the meetings are full of earnestness. At South Camp splendid times have been experienced, and at Caterham, among the Irish Guards and other troops, there are prospects of increased usefulness. Gosport is greatly helped by the Christian ladies who devote time and energy to the welfare of the soldiers, some of whom have found Christ in meetings at the Soldiers' Home. At Shoeburyness a devoted band of Christian soldiers are at work, and blessing has been given, too, at Kingston-on-Thames.

The testimonies might have been prolonged to a late hour, so many and so helpful were the speakers. At this juncture, however, advantage was taken by Mr. W. H. Mills (who has had temporary charge since the death of the late Mr. Arthur H. Wheeler) to introduce the new secretary, Mr. Samuel E. Burrow, who was the recipient of an enthusiastic welcome. Mr. Burrow has had wide experience in work among men, both in the West of England, where he was closely identified with the Y.M.C.A., and in connection with Dr. Barnardo's "Edinburgh Castle" at Limehouse, E. In well-chosen words Mr. Burrow spoke of his acceptance of his new responsibilities in obedience to Divine leadings.

At the evening public meeting, further testimonies of work in South Africa were heartily received.

Day by Day.

SUNDAY, December 23. Jeremiah xlvi.

THE rest of this book is filled with prophecies directed against foreign nations, beginning with Egypt, and ending with Babylon. We have here two distinct prophecies, the one describing the defeat of the Egyptian army at the River Euphrates (1-12), the other describing the invasion and conquest of Egypt by Nebuchadnezzar (13-26). For ages Egypt was the greatest nation of the known world; the remains of her splendour have defied the obliterating touch of time. It seemed as impossible that the glory of this vast empire should decay, as that Macaulay's New Zealander should sit on the broken arches of London Bridge to sketch the ruins of St. Paul's; but destruction certainly befel Egypt. Let us see to it that it does not befal the great empire to which we belong. Yet thoughtful men, who notice the signs of the times, the extravagance, the love of pleasure, the pride of power, the impurity, and the drunkenness, sometimes dread lest the handwriting may already be on the wall, and lest another Jeremiah might not be able to announce an impending dissolution.

As we read this chapter, we should remember that, throughout the Bible, Egypt is always used as the symbol of the world, out of which the children of God have been redeemed; and we are reminded that the world passeth away as a fading flower. What manner of persons ought we to be in all godliness?

Let us greatly ponder the closing verses of this chapter. We shall outlive the civilization by which we are now surrounded. It is our school; but our discipline will soon be ended, and let us be thankful that it is always "in measure." We are not left unpunished, but God will never make a full end of us (vv. 27, 28).

MONDAY, December 24. Jeremiah xlvii.

It is probable that the Philistines were humiliated, first by the Egyptians, and afterwards by the Chaldeans. It is of the latter invasion that the prophet is speaking. The prophecy ends with a remarkable apostrophe to the sword of the Lord. It was an age of terrible wars. Palestine was the battlefield between Egypt and Babylon. The tender heart of the prophet was almost broken with the bitter misery inflicted on his people; it seemed as though the sword of God's judgments could not be appeased, though hecatombs of victims had drenched the soil with their hearts' blood. The prophet, however, did not need Divine revelation to show that there could be no cessation of suffering until the work of chastisement was fulfilled.

Ah, weary sufferer, afflicted, tempest-tossed, exposed to an unbroken series of trials, it is impossible for God to put back his sword into its scabbard so long as there are sins which thou refusest to surrender, or wrongs which thou art unwilling to make right. Where, however, it is quite certain that there is nothing about which God can have a controversy, and yet the pain continues, we must believe that others are being taught a lesson of patience through us; or that God is revealing to the principalities in heavenly places the mighty efficacy of his sustaining grace to solace and succour the soul when it is in sore straits.

It is a blessed thought that the sword of penalty for our sins has been sheathed, since Jesus died, the Just for the unjust!

TUESDAY, December 25. Jeremiah xlviii.

This poem, anticipating the fall of Moab, should be read from the Revised Version, that its surpassing beauty may become apparent. A sudden blow falls upon the land, and her people go forth from the desolated cities to shelter in the dens and caves; the priests carry the image of Chemosh with them, whilst women and children take refuge from the fierce soldiery, who are set to do their work thoroughly. The prophet also compares the ruined country to a drunken man reeling helplessly and falling to the ground; and then bewails the desolation of the land under the form of a vineyard trampled beneath the foot of the spoiler. His own heart is broken with anguish, as he sees the awful suffering to which the Moabites are exposed; and this gives us a clue to the greatness of the tragedy, for nothing else could have extorted from a Jew tears of sorrow for the fate of a hostile and rival people.

Perhaps, however, the paragraph which will most arrest, and remain with, the reader is that from v. 11, which so exactly describes the life of many. It was the practice in olden wine-making to pour the liquid from vessel to vessel, until it was rid of the heavier products, which sank to the bottom. When this process was not fulfilled, the liquid remained rank and distasteful, "the taste remained, and the scent was not changed."

Is not this a clue to God's dealings with us all? We have to pass through many changes, from home to home, business to business, that we may be delivered from ingredients which would detract from our richest value. But better this than that God should send "wanderers" (v. 12), that is, "tilters," who should raise up the cask on its end in order completely to empty it. Better to be filtered by God, than to be cast away as wine which is unpalatable to the taste.

WEDNESDAY, December 26. Jeremiah xlix.

When Israel was carried into captivity, the Ammonites took the opportunity of seizing on a portion of Gad, as if no remnant of the Jewish people remained, and the captives were never to return. For this Ammon was to suffer, and her fruitful valleys were to flow with blood (1-6).

There is a remarkable similarity between certain parts of this prophecy, and Obadiah (Cf. 9, 10, 14-16, with Obad. 2-6.). Evidently Jeremiah had become deeply imbued with the thoughts and words of the older prophet. There are some memorable expressions which we may cull as we pass: The command of v. 8, "dwell deep," which may well be appropriated by all of us in reference to that hiding in the heart of Christ, which is our only safety. Moreover, there is the precious promise of v. 11, which has been an anchor of safety to thousands of widows and fatherless children. There is also the magnificent simile of v. 19, where God compares the rock-hewn city to a sheepfold, and sends an enemy against it, like a lion which the strongest shepherd cannot resist (see vii. 22). Damascus, Kedar, and Elam share the same fate.

It should be remarked how God's servant discriminates between the ultimate results of the discipline through which these various nations were passing. Of some he says, "I will bring again their captivity" (vv. 6, 39); in other cases he holds out no such hope, and the ruin is irretrievable. We are reminded of the words of our Lord, when He says that certain will go into eternal punishment, and the righteous into eternal life. There is a judgment of nations as well as of individuals. Ere we cry out against the apparent anomalies of the Divine government, let us wait to see the full realization of his purpose.

THURSDAY, December 27. Jeremiah l.

These prophecies culminate in vivid and awful pictures of the overthrow and destruction of Babylon, which would also issue in the deliverance of Israel. These words should be read along with the story of the Book of Daniel, which tells us how certainly they were fulfilled, when Darius and Cyrus entered the mighty city. The fall of Babylon would mean the emancipation of the Children of Israel, which is recorded in the books of Ezra and Nehemiah.

Our minds, however, are led forward to a yet greater catastrophe, when Babylon the Great shall come to an end, and the voice of God shall bid his people come forth, lest they be partakers of her plagues.

Let us linger over the sweet words which describe the return of Israel, and the intention of the chastened people to join themselves to the Lord in a perpetual covenant. Nothing can be clearer than the promise of v. 19, which can hardly have been fulfilled in all its fulness, but must be waiting for yet further realization!

How tender and beautiful is the promise that iniquity and sin shall be so entirely forgiven as not to be found! (v. 20.) Sometimes conscience tries to find the sin of past years; sometimes Satan throws it up against us; sometimes we dread the disclosures of the judgment-seat. But how absolutely the text meets all such alarm. It tells us that when God forgives He remembers no more; that when sin is confessed, it is immediately and entirely done away; and that all the searching of our great enemy shall not be able to establish a charge against those whom God has forgiven. And all this because our Redeemer is strong. Those that held us fast will have to release us; those that condemned must acquiesce in our acquittal (vv. 33-34).

FRIDAY, December 28. Jeremiah li.

Babylon had been as a golden cup. She had served as God's instrument, but the day of her judgment came because she had exceeded her commission. In the expressive words of Jeremiah, "fanners." came to winnow her away, and it became manifest that Israel had not been forsaken, though their land had been filled with sin against the Holy One. They had done everything to offend the Divine purity, yet their Almighty Friend still stood to the ancient covenant (5). Ah, fellow-believer, how comforting this is for thee and me! Our God hateth putting away. His love lingers still around our lives with tender pitifulness, and this because the Portion of Jacob is not like man. He is the Former of all things, and we are his inheritance (v. 19).

A solemn lesson is suggested from v. 20. We may have been the instrument of God's purpose, his battle-axe, and weapons of war; yet in performing his will it is possible so to grieve his Holy Spirit, that He may cast us aside. It should be borne in mind that the I will of this passage should be rendered I have. "I have broken, I have destroyed."

It becomes us to remember that the predictions against Babylon were literally fulfilled, especially those of vv. 31, 37, 58. So shall it be with Babylon the Great, of the fate of which the Book of Revelation is full. God fulfils the jots and tittles of his word. Listen to and obey the clarion note of v. 45: "Let us go forth to Him without the gate."

SATURDAY, December 29. Jeremiah lii.

This chapter is almost exactly identical with 2 Kings xxiv. 18-20, 25. It is remarkable that it follows on the record of the significant incident with which the previous chapter terminates. Here is an account of the destruction of Jerusalem, and the captivity of the people, together with the vessels of the holy place. But immediately preceding, we have the story of the roll of prophecy against Babylon being bound to a stone, and flung into the midst of the Euphrates. How brief is the pride of men! To-day they succeed, to-morrow their very record perishes. Now they spread themselves like the green bay tree, to-morrow they are cut off and withered.

Have you ever thought of the contrast between the words which Shakespeare puts into the mouth of Hamlet and the words just quoted of the great Apostle? The one compares the whips and scorns of time with the dreams that come in death, and prefers to live. In his judgment both life and death are evil, and life is only the less evil of the two. How different St. Paul! His soul is irradiated with the light of God! he stands 'twixt the blessings of life and death, but has a desire to depart. Life is good, but death is better. Such is the contrast between a man of the world and a child of God.

Oh, you who are passing through this, and on whom lies the heavy hand of the oppressor, comfort yourselves with the predictions of chapter li. The shadow of your foes' destruction is in the air; it is only a little while, and they shall not be, yea thou shalt diligently consider their place, and it shall not be! Wherefore lift up your heads and rejoice, for your redemption draweth nigh.

The late Rev. C. A. Fox.

Some Personal Reminiscences.

By Rev. F. S. WEBSTER.

My acquaintance with Mr. Fox began about twenty-three years ago. I well remember his coming to Holy Trinity Church, Richmond, to give us what was called a meditation. His subject was The Woman who Came to Jesus (Luke vii.). There was no formal exposition, and no direct appeal. Both preacher aud congregation remained in the attitude of prayer for fully half-an-hour, during which time every detail of that wonderful story was prayed into our hearts. Our attention was riveted, not by the dramatic unfolding of a beautiful story, but by the spiritual insight displayed, and by an intense realization of the Master's presence. We were constrained, not only to listen, but to worship, to surrender, to trust. He made spiritual things vivid and real, not to our understandings only, but to our hearts.

This impression has been confirmed again and again. When asked by an Oxford Don to mention any occasion when one's experience seemed to come nearest to the joy of heaven, I replied at once, "The Friday evening of the Keswick Convention, and Mr. Fox's closing address and prayer."

All, I think, will admit that while others at Keswick have excelled, perhaps, in the searching exposure of inconsistencies, or in fervent appeals for a fuller consecration, or in the clear definition and skilful arrangement of truth, Mr. Fox was facile princeps in the giving us that and of the glories of an unseen but surrounding heaven, which lifts up the heart and makes victory easy and certain.

Mr. Fox was certainly no mere orator. He did not impress us by excited appeals to our feelings. He had, I think, great gifts of oratory. He could stir the passions of an audience, like a John Bright. But his weapons were spiritual, not carnal. The Master's presence, not the servant's eloquence, was what chiefly impressed us. It was no tide of emotion, soon to ebb back again, which made heaven seem so near. It was a drawing aside of the veil and a spiritual quickening of our dull sight. He spoke in the power of the Holy Ghost; it was as plain as the shining of Stephen's face. None who heard him on such occasions could doubt it.

His poetic genius was, of course, a great help. It gave him a deep and true insight into the heart of nature, and of men, and of God. It kept him moving along the broad lines of the eternal verities. He never seemed disturbed by the trivialities of human definitions and minute distinctions. Not that he was careless in his study, or left loose ends to his theology; but he seemed to have a power of lifting the point in dispute into a calmer, purer atmosphere, where the conflicting views were seen to join in perfect harmony. Like most members of the Keswick Convention, I have had to which were at one time put forth almost as vital truth by some of the speakers; but I cannot remember this being the case with any of the teaching from Mr. Fox. It was fresh inspiration, new vision, more love that one received from him, rather than new truth. He made us feel and see the Master even when we did not fully understand the doctrine.

It was his ready sympathy and his genuine humility that made him so beloved. He had the dangerous gift of sarcasm, but it was most gloriously consecrated. Now and then one felt what scathing words he could have used had his tongue ever slipped from the Master's control. But the gift only added piquancy to his preaching; it was always used in perfect love. Most people are afraid of a man who can be sarcastic. No one was afraid of Charles Fox. Oh, how he drew men to him! My mind goes back to the early days of Keswick, when there was no such overwhelming crowd, and we seemed to have more personal touch with the speakers. How the young men delighted in Mr. Fox. They knew he understood them, and loved them. What an ideal chairman he was for the young men's meetings. Everybody was at the best when he presided. I remember some five or six years ago, when an important foreign appointment was offered me, I turned instinctively to Mr. Fox for counsel. It was such a help to talk the matter over with him, and hear him talk it over with God. For, no man I ever met, possessed as he did. Some men make prayers, and others preach at themselves or their congregations in prayer; but Mr. Fox just talked everything over with God, with the simplicity of a child, and the strong, clear grasp of a great man.

How good he was to me, not then alone, but always. I remember his kind, encouraging words, embodying a valuable caution too, before one of my first addresses at Keswick. I remember his keen interest in my coming back to London—his unfeigned delight at every token of blessing. He could indeed rejoice at another's success. No base envy or petty jealousy ever had a place in his great heart.

But he suffered more than most. There was no veneer in his religion; the beautiful colours were all burnt in. He spoke to us of broken vessels that let the light of heaven shine through, of a broken Jacob transformed into a prince with God, and one knew that he was speaking from his own experience; we saw that he possessed the true brokenness of soul. He had an occasional impediment in speech, which must have been very trying to one whose heart burned to tell out God's truth. Though blessed with a devoted congregation, he occupied but a small corner in the Church of England.

Eaton Chapel has no parish or district; and though probably few Evangelical clergy have succeeded so well in such a position, it must have been a sore trial to him to find his own Sunday ministry so restricted. His uncertain health, however, made it impossible for him to accept any larger sphere. He had been a sufferer from sleeplessness and general weakness for a long time. Every year from 1889 to 1898 he was earnestly invited to come to the Birmingham Convention; but each year came the answer that "the spirit was willing, but the flesh was weak." And oh, the torture of the final eighteen months!

I was one of the first to visit him after the operation in Upper Wimpole Street. It was a terrible shock to see the dear face which had so often shone with the glory of God, so marred and bandaged. But the few minutes in that room—I was only allowed to offer a short prayer—seemed full of the glory of God. On one occasion afterwards I met him in public. It was the first morning meeting of the Students' Conference last January in Exeter Hall. The Archbishop of Canterbury was speaking, and C. A. Fox was on the platform. So intense was his love for young men, so great his interest in the Student Movement, that, weak and marred as he was, he came to that meeting, and surely brought God's benediction with him.

And now he is within the veil. His soul is already in heaven with Christ and the loved ones gone before, waiting in for the resurrection morning, when he will have his "perfect consummation" and bliss, both in body and soul, in God's eternal kingdom. We rejoice to think of his glory. God is not ashamed to be called his God, for he hath prepared for him a city.

While with joy we think of him before the Throne, let us take pains to learn the lessons of his life. Men like Fox are very rare in these days of rush and superficial busy men. C. A. Fox lived beneath an open heaven. He revelled with holy awe in the presentness of of the presence of God. He never seemed hurried. His peace, nay, the Peace of God which manifestly kept him, was unbroken by pain or trouble of any kind. He never thought of himself. He never wanted to lead, to be first, to make a mark. His heart was open to all God's children, and tens of thousands to-day have cause to say of him—"He helped me to see Jesus; he taught me to trust God."

From Miss LUCY A. BENNETT.

Although, through stress of circumstances, there had been some need for correspondence for several years previously—and the correspondence had become very friendly—his bright, hearty spirit breaking through and over-leaping the conventional, even in his very first note—yet it was not until 1888 that I really met Mr. Fox. It was at the Keswick Convention; and the deep impression made by his addresses, and still more, perhaps, by his prayers at that Convention, is still fresh and abiding. Throughout the twelve years which have passed since then, amid many and varied circumstances, there has never been a thing known to me—never a word even—to mar the memory of one who, more than most men, palpably dwelt "in the secret place of the Most High." You could not be in his company without feeling it; you could not listen to his intense, adoring words in speech or supplication without realizing that the veiled Presence was, of all real things, the most real to him. Even in a hastily written post-card (and his friends well know what his expressive hasty messages were like!) there was sure to be some sentence, or some suggestive word, which carried with it the atmosphere of Heaven; and yet so easily and naturally; no dragging in of "religion;" not the suspicion of "goody-goodiness." It was just a turn of the heart to the heart's Centre—Christ. We sing sometimes,

Prayer is the Christian's vital breath,
The Christian's native air.

In Mr. Fox the words were verified. We remember how readily he would appeal, in public addresses, from man to God, and then to man again. In his home or by the wayside it was just the same. There was no jar, no abrupt transition, but instantly one was lifted above all seen things; for the unseen things were, somehow, the nearest to him.

It is hardly possible to put into cold print how compatible all this was with the most winsome and chastened gaiety. At heart he was a child. With a childlike simplicity, and with more than a child's enthusiasm, he peered into the opening bud, and gazed, awestruck, at the hedgerow nest, and found room for them all in the full compass of his song too, although, at other times, the octave struck was wondrously deep and strong—carrying us into the very wonderland of God's secret ways. Mr. Fox was a true poet. Had he been able to bring himself to a severer censorship of his own rapid and spontaneous work, he would have stood even higher than he stands, but there can be no doubt at all about the genuine character of the rich poetic ore which was there in such profusion. The poems are packed almost too full of it. The thought is so quick, so iridescent, that one is almost baffled as one tries to follow or keep pace. Most noticeable is the spirituality of the poems—the outspoken recognition of the Lord of all, and of his claims upon us. Where some master minds, even among the Christian poets, have been satisfied with a religious or ecclesiastical sort of tone, Mr. Fox is found as the reverent and prostrate worshipper. Where others have, perhaps unconsciously, seemed almost to deify nature, or to confuse nature with God, Mr. Fox, loving every bit of God's handiwork with all his heart, yet reserves the passion of his soul for the Creator Himself.

Bowed on the riven granite, I adore Thee,
Earthquake and fire already have been here;
Pass, in procession pass, great God, before me,
My soul stands forth uncovered, wrapt in fear. . . .
God's soul comes down and meets me on the mountains,
And tells me all his secret thoughts aloud, &c.

This was the attitude of his mind. "I thought you would so enjoy the voice of God audible," he remarked to me once, as he stood at the garden gate of his beloved Dorking home, in pelting rain, after a tremendous thunderstorm, to welcome me for the happy day which, with great kindness, Mrs. Fox and he had planned.

This is not the time, nor the place, for a survey of his literary work—though one yet hopes to see that take its right place in our literature.

We are thinking rather of the great warm heart that has ceased to beat amongst us—a heart so open, always, to appeal; and we are thanking God for the clear, bright testimony of a life so transparent.

> Live life with windows wide,
> That all may see the mystic Christ inside,

he urged, and that is what God enabled him to do.

It is true that the shy, sensitive soul shrank from egoism, and that his references to himself were few (even under the certain shadow of that last thick cloud, how pathetically reticent, how reluctant to cause anxiety!); but sometimes a revealing, unguarded word betrayed secrets, and one was waylaid by the sudden vision of a life of saintliness and self-sacrifice. How little some who listened to his rapid, racy, burning utterances at Keswick, Mildmay, or elsewhere, guessed what it cost him to appear on a public platform at all.

There was room in Mr. Fox's sympathies for all who truly loved the Lord Jesus. "All one in Christ Jesus" was to him no mere motto.

To one who had spoken to him something about not belonging to the Church of England, he said, "Oh, we never ask that at Keswick." Then, wheeling round, "I belong to the Inclusive Brethren," he added with a merry smile, "Don't say you belong to the Exclusives, or you might exclude me." "I don't belong to any of them, but they all belong to me," said the other, and the answer pleased him. How charming he was as a companion, was partly due to his EXTRAORDINARY GIFT OF LISTENING.

Even the shyest was drawn out by his unaffected interest in the tiniest details confided to him. "Yes, I am coming to hear you," I heard him say to a chatty friend he had met, and who asked him to call. "I am a good listener," he remarked afterwards—as he passed on, and it was so true. In these hurried days the art of listening well is one almost lost. In Mr. Fox it was conspicuous both on the Godward and the manward sides. It was because he hushed his heart to "hearken" that he had so much to tell us of God's secret things. There are far more injunctions to "hearken" than to "speak" in the Bible, but we have practically inverted the importance of the two things, perhaps.

The late Mr. Bowker, one time Chairman of the Convention, liked to tell how he had once playfully rallied Mr. Fox before a meeting.

"Are you going to take us to the third or to the seventh heaven to-night?"

"My dear friend," was the quick retort, "whichever heaven I go to, you will be sure to follow."

"I feel, sometimes," said the same friend to him, on one occasion, "my utter unworthiness; even to creep inside the doors of heaven at last, and take the lowest place of all, seems too much for me."

"You selfish fellow! You want the best place of all. You want to see all the others come in," was Mr. Fox's rejoinder. They loved each other very much, those two, now reunited.

How Mr. Fox spoke of his friends, many of us know. Not less generous was his treatment of his critics. He would insist on defending their criticisms, even when adverse.

How we shall miss him! How wide is the gap made! And to one frail, gentle mourner in particular what must it be! And yet how could we but give thanks as we heard that the cross borne so long and so patiently had been exchanged for the crown?

It is for others, more privileged by far, to tell of those days when the tidings of terrible sufferings lay like a burden upon many hearts in the stricken Church of Christ. To-day we recall rather the fragrant memory of those days when he was able almost to hide that he suffered. And shall we not give glory to Him who has called our dear friend to his eternal rest? His own words come back to us—the last, I suppose, that he wrote:

> Sweet his whisper, "Come and rest,"
> Wrecked outright on Jesus' breast.

Gains and Losses.

By Mrs. HARVEY-JELLIE.

> If for a world a soul be lost,
> Who can the loss supply?
> More than a thousand worlds it cost
> One single soul to buy.

DANIEL MAXTON had betaken himself to a close room behind his little shop of curiosities, in one of London's crowded back streets. Now and again a moan or twitch disturbed his repose, but the old man was weary indeed.

Hildah, his daughter, sat on a stool in the shop, guarding the conglomeration of books and curios. Few customers ever troubled at that hour in the afternoon. She was, therefore, indulging in a sort of reverie. It was only yesternight that she had gone to a mission hall to please a strange, dwarfish object, who was her father's right hand in business; but what she had heard set her longing for more.

Peter, with his high shoulders and short legs, was sharp in intellect, and since Daniel took him at his mother's death, he had proved a valuable help in that peculiar line of trade. But there had come a change; for that light which nothing but sin can shut out had flooded his soul, and salvation full and free was accepted. Hildah started, as Peter entered from the street carrying a small box containing a ring.

"I mean to carry it back, though," he said, holding it on his open hand toward her. The flashing stone, set in gold, appeared very beautiful to the girl.

"He's asleep," she added, seeing Peter turn toward the back room. "What does this mean?" He closed the box slowly, and looked at her with his piercing black eyes as he answered:—

"Means just this: it is easy to gain the world and lose your own soul, that's all;" and as he went behind the counter to attend to some work, Hildah's thoughts were again in that hall, where she had heard those words, "lose his own soul." She could almost hear again the voices as they sang—

> "A charge to keep I have.
> A God to glorify,
> A never-dying soul to save
> And fit it for the sky."

Forgetting the shop, with its hetergeneous contents, her spirit seemed lured toward something vastly more important.

"Come what may," said Peter, emerging from behind the counter, "I must have done with this to-night. What we heard last night won't square with this business, so there must be an end to it."

Suddenly the the door opened, and the old man shouted roughly, "Doing such brisk trade that I must wait for tea, eh?" Hildah quickly made ready, and Peter meanwhile held consultation with her father. Soon after, as she poured out the tea, she noticed Peter was gone, and spoke of it.

"Let him go if he likes. He! to develop scruples, and flaunt them in my face; fine humbug when fifty pounds lies under your very fingers! I've sent him off with my message, and none of his nonsense about losing. Don't I know where gain lies after all my experience?"

Hildah was alarmed to see the anger in his eyes as he added: "I heard that you went to that canting place last night. Thank heaven, Peter is none of my stock. But you! I am making all my gains for you, my girl, and if you get contaminated I'll cut you off!" and he went into the shop to meet Peter coming back with a look of the satisfaction of full decision.

"I've settled that bit of business, and he can keep the ring. I can't trade that way, master. It means sure loss in the end. I have done with the old life."

There seemed nothing for him (an unfortunate, ill-formed creature) but to turn out as a homeless stranger, for Daniel thundered out his ire, and, reaching the ledger, bade him make up accounts, finish his work, and begone.

Hildah entreated that he might stay the night, as it was late. In her own heart there was fear and trembling, for she knew her father's hard and unforgiving nature. When midnight was over the house, it was only Peter who slept. A month earlier he would have been in terror; but now his heart was stayed on God, and "the everlasting arms" were about him.

Still sitting in his chair, Daniel Maxton scanned over and over the carefully arranged book; but a curse rose to his lips when, under the sum total, he read in bold handwriting, "What is a man profited if he shall gain the whole world and lose his own soul; or what shall a man give in exchange for his soul?"

Anger and excitement hastened on one of his old attacks. Hildah, who was wide awake, heard a heavy thud. She had often feared those fits would be fatal, and hurrying down stairs she found, as she expected, that her father had fallen from his chair. Peter was aroused, and quickly came to render help. They had never seen him so bad. In early morning the doctor came, and expressed his fear.

Distressing days followed, in which he only slightly rallied, and took no notice. Peter was a tender nurse, as well as manager in the shop. During those dark days God's Word entered Hildah's heart, and the true light began to dawn. Like a child awakened, she was crying out for God, and while she was yet praying He heard and answered.

One evening Peter had closed the shop, and was patiently sitting beside his old master while Hildah prepared his supper. Suddenly turning his head, Daniel fixed his eyes on Peter, and startled him by saying:

"Peter, good fellow, you didn't go? Where am I? Ah, I've been through an age of terror since I have been here. I saw the gulf, and felt I was lost; come and tell me how it stands—not with the accounts or the shop; it's my soul, I mean," and again he lapsed into silence.

Hildah stood near, and took his hot hand, speaking softly to him. "My child," he answered. "Hildah, come close and call Peter." The quaint little man placed himself nearer, and offered to help move the pillows.

"I can tell you Jesus died to save your soul, and give eternal gain. He paid the price of sin. Believe and accept forgiveness, and let Him cleanse your heart. Only Jesus can do helpless sinners good, master. He isn't willing that even you should perish and lose your own soul," and Peter closed his eyes. "Go on, why do you stop?" asked Daniel.

"I WANTED TO PRAY FOR YOU, MASTER."

"Suppose I try and pray for myself. "Oh think of it! Dare I?"—and the feeble man trembled as a child.

They left him for a little and could not hear his words, but they were heard in heaven, for from that hour salvation came to Daniel Maxton's soul. . . .

Six months passed on. It was the same room behind the shop, but all was altered.

Daniel and Peter had settled the question of gains and losses in the light of eternity. Pure and honest trade was carried on, and from that house an influence for good went forth into a dark neighbourhood.

Hildah found opportunities for Christlike service, and her father loved to hear her read the old story of God's love over and over.

Peter remained, beloved in the home, and by many who called him "the evangelist," for he was welcome at the death-bed and among the young people, and his words led many to Christ.

Temperance Work among Showmen.—Christian workers who visit show people at fairs, or in their caravans wherever they are to be found, are invited to communicate with Miss Millington hon. secretary of the Travellers' National Total Abstinence Union), at Layerthorpe Grove, York, who will be pleased to send them copies of The Caravan, a small publication specially adapted for these travellers. During the winter months many such wanderers are to be found in vacant spaces about the London suburbs. In the early part of the year they assemble in considerable numbers at the Agricultural Hall, Islington, N., and the workers at the day school and Sunday services would gladly welcome additional helpers. Testimony is borne to the invariable courtesy and kindness with which visitors are received, as well as the pleasure with which Gospel messages are listened to and publications accepted.

Mr. W. Stanley Martin,

PROTESTANT LECTURER AND AUTHOR.

SPECIALISM is a method of our times. The all-round man in this utilitarian age is becoming scarce. Rightly directed, the specialist principle is a good one. Most of the servants of God of whom we read in Holy Scripture were specialists. Aholiab and Bezaleel, "called," "chosen," and "filled with wisdom of heart to work," are examples from the Old Testament; while in the New Testament we are expressly told that there are in the manifestation of the Spirit "diversities of gifts" bestowed to every man severally as God in his wisdom wills.

The needs of special occasions, too, call forth divinely appointed specialists to accomplish a needed work. The subject of our present sketch, Mr. W. Stanley Martin, is an illustration of the principle of specialism in the Lord's work. He has become impressed with the importance of instructing our children in the principles of Bible Protestantism and in a knowledge of the historic triumphs won by our forefathers in their martyr conflicts with Rome; and he has embarked upon a campaign to compass this desirable end. It gives us peculiar pleasure, therefore, to present our readers with the portrait of one who, both by his gifted pen and attractive lantern lectures, is exercising a very extensive influence among the young in the interests of Reformation truth.

From Photograph by Mr. W. W. White, Derby.

Mr. Martin is yet in the prime of life, having been born at Blackheath in 1865. Many years of useful service, both in the Press and in the lecture-room, are, we trust, before him. Grace, as we know, is not hereditary, neither does devotion to Protestant principles descend from sire to son, or from one generation to another. Yet it is an interesting fact that the subject of our present narrative is a descendant of Derick Carver, the proto-martyr of the county of Sussex, in the reign of the bigoted Papist, Queen Mary. Carver sealed his faith in Christ at the stake, in 1556, at Lewes, and his blood-stained Bible, recovered from the priest-kindled flames which consumed its faithful owner, is still carefully preserved.

An important link in the chain of the Lord's providence is traceable in the fact that, as a boy, Stanley Martin was sent to a private boarding school, conducted by a gentleman possessed of the happy gift of imparting his extensive knowledge to his pupils, while actuated by fervent zeal for the truth of God, and a strong desire to promote a love of Protestant principles in the hearts of those committed to his charge. This gentleman's establishment was situated, at the time of which we write, in the north of London. The well-known "Islington Protestant Institute" was coincidently carrying on a remarkably well-organized work for the diffusion of Protestant knowledge, under the earnest and able leadership of the late Rev. Samuel Wainwright. The remarkable eloquence of that eminent Protestant advocate attracted large audiences in various parts of Islington. At many of those meetings not the least interested auditor was the school-boy who, in maturer years, has ardently endeavoured to follow in the footsteps of his instructors. The stirring story of the historic siege of Derry, told on a certain occasion by the eloquent Mr. Wainwright, made a deep and lasting impression on the mind of the lad.

A few years after leaving school, Stanley Martin was divinely led to appreciate the important difference between an intellectual acquaintance with historical Protestantism and a personal, saving knowledge of Christ. God's appointed "means of grace" were effectual. The spiritual experience through which the Holy Spirit led young Martin's soul included that legal process which in some cases is more marked than in others—a painful proving of the impossibility of establishing creature righteousness. Little by little, Gospel light dawned upon the convicted, burdened conscience, the need of the substitutionary atonement and of the righteousness of faith being revealed to him by the Spirit of grace.

Without loss of time, the disciple set to work. In 1888 he was led to take an active part in a Protestant forward movement in South-East London, in particular among the children. From that memorable start-point he developed original work, with the same important object in view. The claims of children lie very near his heart, and command his earnest prayers. By voice and by pen his efforts have for years been untiringly, and, under God's approval, successfully, carried on. His pen is singularly gifted in the interest of young readers. Perhaps, his most telling book for juveniles is "The Story of Some Famous Bonfires." It has deservedly enjoyed a wide circulation. This truly Protestant publication has been followed by others, including "Fireships, Fireworks, and Firebrands;" "The Story of the Man that Fought the Giants"—a children's life of Martin Luther; and a very attractive book just issued, namely, "The Tinker of Bedford, and the Book that He Wrote"—a bright little volume on John Bunyan and "The Pilgrim's Progress."

In addition to these admirable books for the young, Mr. Martin has established a penny Protestant monthly, cleverly illustrated, entitled Uncle Ben's Budget. (1d., Morgan & Scott.) This brightly edited periodical deserves the hearty patronage of Christian parents, and of all interested in the welfare of the rising generation. We can warmly recommend it as sound in Bible doctrine, thorough in its Protestantism, and free from the taint of denominationalism, as well as from anything approaching a bitter un-Christlike tone. The truth is spoken, but it is in a loving spirit.

During the winter months, with the aid of lime-light lantern, a popular educational work is carried on by Mr. Martin for children. One of the most successful of such meetings took place in the spacious "Dome" at Brighton, when over 2,000 children listened, with evident interest, to Mr. Martin's instructive Protestant address. Those who have heard his public lectures acknowledge that he has a rare gift of securing and holding the attention of youthful audiences. We confidently ask the prayers of our readers that the noble enterprise which Mr. Martin has been led to prosecute, with marked results for good, may continue to prosper; and that, under God's blessing, thousands of the future men and women of England may become, by these means, consistent followers of the Protestant worthies whose faithfulness at the period of the Reformation secured to their posterity the blessings of an open Bible, liberty of conscience, and emancipation from the intolerable tyranny of priestcraft.

Communications for Mr. Martin may be addressed to the care of Messrs. Morgan and Scott, office of The Christian, 12, Paternoster Buildings, E.C.

World-Wide Circle of Prayer.

WITH reference to the appeal for the first day of the New year to be set apart as a day of special prayer and supplication, Rev. F. B. Meyer writes:

"The old-time singer said: 'I was glad when they said unto me, "Let us go into the House of the Lord. Our feet shall stand within thy gates, O Jerusalem!"' Above our world, with its hubbub and strife, the city of concerted and united prayer is moored. Thither the tribes go up, the tribes of the Lord, and in its streets all holy souls mingle—in the act of intercession. 'Ye are come unto Mount Zion, and unto the city of the living God the heavenly Jerusalem . . . and to the spirits of just men made perfect . . . and to Jesus the Mediator.'

"Whenever we pray thus, we rise above the limits of the folds, and identify ourselves with the one flock; we cease to be occupied with the churches, and realize our union with the one Church, the Bride, and the Body of Christ; we leave for a moment the smaller concerns of our narrow lives, and become burdened with those common interests which lie on the heart of our Lord, and of those whom He summons to watch with Him.

"Time and space make no difference to those who pray and praise, who intercede and worship. From all parts of the world, and of the universe, the spirits of the elect servants of God, which are caused to draw near unto Him, assemble, and stand side by side, uttering the same desires, joining in the same Hosannas. There is nothing which so conspicuously answers our Lord's Prayer in John xvii. as the act of intercessory supplication. Let us more often frequent that city of holy desire, aspiration, and intercession.

Though sundered far, by faith we meet
Around the common mercy seat.

The secretaries of the World-Wide Circle of Prayer are: Rev. J. O. West (St. Phillip's Rectory, Bristol) and Mr. John Blackham (West Bromwich), to either of whom communications may be addressed. There was never, perhaps, a more critical time in the world's history when the united prayers of the Lord's people were so urgently required.

A Martyr of Jesus.

MISS ANNIE KING, OF HO-TSIN.

AMONGST the names in the earlier lists of the martyrs of Jesus in China, some may have noticed that of Miss Annie King, who, together with her fellow-workers, Mr. and Mrs. George McConnell, and three others, were massacred at Ho-tsin on July 12 or 16.

As a neighbour of Miss King's, and a friend of the family, I may be allowed to write of one whose simple, earnest piety and loyal devotion to the mission cause were well known to all acquainted with her, and whose tragic death at the early age of thirty years has created a very deep impression in her home town, Berkeley, Glos., and elsewhere.

It had long been her cherished wish to enter the mission field, but it was not until September, 1898, that, in connection with the C.I.M., she really set sail for China, after having previously passed through a course of preparatory study at Dr. Grattan Guinness' East London Training Institute.

The note of praise with which she commenced her voyage diary is emphasized and reiterated from time to time. From Shanghai she writes on her arrival, November 3 :—

Praise the Lord, I am really in China! So nice to be here, after all the years of looking forward! It seems too good to be true! I cannot express how full of joy my heart is, and of praise too, to the Lord for choosing and bringing me to this dark, dark part of his vineyard, to work for Him. I don't know what the future holds for me, but whatever comes, I know I have obeyed the will of our God. . . . If only you could see the need of Gospel light in this city!

These early impressions only deepened as the months went by, and the exceeding gladness of her heart in the work must be strong consolation now to those who, in giving her to the Lord, gave of their best, accounting that "He was worthy." She wrote :—

I feel so confident that you will be greatly blessed by God for giving me up to his service.

From the many and deeply interesting letters which lie before me, anyone would see at once that Annie King was possessed of a bright, sunny disposition —ready always to see the fun in anything, and with a pen which could draw vivid pictures of her surroundings. Her descriptions of Chinese life are fresh and realistic, and it would be easy to give lengthy extracts; but the space at disposal admits of very brief ones.

I am busy getting a very broad-brimmed hat for the journey (to Ho-tsin). It is two yards round, all but one inch. The natives don't spend much time or money on trimmings. The hats are lined up with blue calico, strings of the same; nothing on the outside.

The exceeding deliberateness of the natives (to put it mildly) struck her very much. "It means something to start in China," she explains, in connection with this same removal to Ho-tsin, last year.

We left Tientsin at mid-day, and sailed away up the north river, and to-night finds us only twenty li from there (between six and seven miles). All day we have been at a standstill. We are to stay here for the night. The boat is very comfortable, with plenty of ventilation where the boards don't exactly fit.

Later on, she speaks of far longer and more serious delays, and the journey to North China occupied about eight weeks altogether, including delays.

A warm welcome awaited her at Ho-'tsin, not only from her fellow-workers, with whom she was speedily at home, but also from the natives. Throwing herself, as she did, heartily into their manner of life, and with the most delicate consideration for their feelings and many prejudices, it is little wonder that she speedily won the hearts of the people. Invitations poured in upon her, and we find her responding gladly and praisefully, rejoicing in every newly-opened door, and in every opportunity of telling forth her good news of Jesus.

I had my Bible with me, that the dear Ragged School friends presented me with. They (the natives) wondered what it was, and begged me to give it them. I told them it was God's Book, and told us about Jesus. They looked very wonderingly, so I asked them if they had heard of Jesus. It made my heart very sad to see them shake their heads and say "No." How sweet it was to speak the name of our dear Redeemer to those dear dark hearts! They were very friendly, and invited us very earnestly to go home with them. . . . Good-byes were exchanged, to which they added, "Come again." We were all rejoicing at the way they treated us, but sad to leave them.

There is a pleasing but pathetic account of the visit of some native Christians, without any missionary in their district.

They had come to invite us to go back with them, . . . and were so eager, and pressed us so much, saying, "We know so little of the good tidings, and we want to know more, and there is no one to teach us. Won't you come, so that we may have one li-pai" (meeting).

MISS ANNIE KING.

From Photograph by Mr. J. H. Elliott, Stroud.

Sadder far the accounts of those who had never heard the Gospel at all, and who were terrified, at first, at the very appearance of a foreigner.

The letters throughout are a conclusive and striking reply to the cruel and clumsy criticisms upon the work of missionaries in China, and their alleged responsibility for the recent outbreak. It is as plain as possible that there is real soul-hunger in China, and that the earnest workers there have sought in every way possible to win the poor dark hearts for Christ.

In the case of Miss King and her party, the personal affection was evidently very strong indeed, and mutually so, although there are not wanting indications of an opposing spirit on the part of those to whom—in China, as alas! in more favoured lands—the cross of Christ is an offence.

Long ago, Mr. Spurgeon said—and he was not speaking of heathen lands—"Bid farewell to a quiet life, if you resolve to be true to Jesus. The carnal mind rages at the cross of Christ. Nothing excites such animosity as the preaching of Jesus." If that be true of favoured England, can we wonder that, to some extent, it has doubtless been so in China? It would be a stigma upon our Christian workers there if, to the haters of God and the enemies of righteousness, there had been nothing disturbing and spiritually antagonistic in their message, if the Word of the Eternal had been no "terror to the evil-doer." Events have proved that upon our brothers and sisters in Ho-tsin no such stigma can be laid. And they have sealed their witness with their blood—how willingly may be inferred from their own bright testimony, written before any serious symptoms had appeared of that fatal and deep-seated opposition, which has resulted in the late terrible carnage and persecution. In one of her last letters, Miss King had written to her parents :

The thought of our Lord Jesus Christ's return has been very blessed to me the last few months, causing me to pray with more earnestness than before that God will grant what has been my daily desire for years —even when I was going to school—that in that day each member of our family may stand before God, clothed in the robe of Christ's righteousness, and enter into life eternal. He has told us to "watch." To those who are ready, what a blessed day that will be!

Far other than she thought, was the manner of his coming for her, but unquestionably the cry of Miss King and her fellow-martyrs would have been that taught by the Divine Leader of the host, "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do."

Forgive them! This the burden of our sighing,
For his dear sake who hath their ransom paid.
Let heralds of salvation, multiplying,
Repair the woful breaches sin hath made.

Forgive them! Hear the pale lips humbly pleading,
More mutely eloquent than e'er before.
How can we doubt a holy interceding—
"Forgive them"—was the death-stamp that they wore?

Forgive them! Hear thy stricken Church uplifting
The cry love-learnt beneath a cross of pain;
What shall we do in this sad hour of sifting,
But breathe the echoes softly once again?

Forgive them, Father! No farewells were spoken,
We may not strew with flowers the billowy sod;
Let living lives upspringing be the token—
White souls, in blossom with the grace of God.

LUCY A. BENNETT.

Thy Corner Waits.

"Thy work shall be rewarded, saith the Lord" (Jer. xxxi. 16).

Go work for Me to-day, dear heart;
Thy corner waits for thee;
No other one can do thy part,
So therefore earnest be.

Go forth to serve, equipped by grace;
Seek thou my will to do;
Fear not, if called some ill to face,
My strength will bear thee through.

Stoop thou to do the little things,
If such to thee are given;
For they will prove as angel-wings,
To bear thee nearer Heaven.

Whate'er thou dost, my love will own,
If done as unto Me;
And, at the last, before my throne,
Thy work shall honoured be.

The Murdered Missionaries.

MEMORIAL SERVICE.

MANY tender ties combined to draw out sympathy and interest in connection with a memorial service held in Bloomsbury Chapel, London, last Thursday evening. A large congregation was gathered together from many quarters, drawn by the terrible sense of loss sustained by the Baptist Missionary Society in China. A large part of the service was devotional, Rev. B. J. Gibbon (the pastor) presiding.

Speaking under deep emotion, Rev. ARTHUR SOWERBY, of Hsin-chow—the only surviving missionary of the staff formerly at work in the province of Shansi—referred to the fact that though the work in Shansi had been going on for twenty years, it was really a pioneer mission; "and we must not be dismayed if our brethren and sisters have met the fate of pioneers, and if over their fallen bodies the Church has to advance to yet greater victories." He explained that the missionaries were divided into two bands, one at Tai-yuen-fu and the other at Hsin-chow. When he himself went out, there was not one convert in the province connected with the Baptist Missionary Society, but after long labour a few were gathered in; and, on returning from a furlough about ten years ago, he found that much progress had been made.

"TRULY CONSECRATED."

Speaking of his beloved colleagues, Mr. Sowerby referred in terms of deepest affection and admiration to Rev. George B. and Mrs. Farthing, and described the far-reaching way in which their work had spread to distant town and cities. During a long absence of his wife and family in England on account of health, Mr. Farthing lived alone, and neglected all steps for making himself comfortable; indeed it appeared as if he were not aware whether he was comfortable or not, giving himself up entirely to the work of God. His whole time was devoted to the consideration of plans for the future, and to study of the Word of God. "If consecration means a whole-souled devotion, without one thought of self, he was a truly consecrated man."

As new workers Rev. T. J. and Mrs Underwood had lived with him for six months. After a residence of three years, Mr. Underwood was a beautiful Chinese speaker; "he spoke with spiritual power, so that the Chinese were impressed, and a blessing fell upon them when he addressed them."

At Hsin-chow the labours of Rev. Herbert and Mrs. Dixon were much blessed. Rev. W. A. and Mrs. McCurrach, who were also stationed there, passed through prolonged bodily suffering. As to Rev. Sidney W. Ennals, Mr. Sowerby thanked God for such a young man as companion during a period in which his wife was absent. "I never met one who so readily adapted himself to the Chinese." Of Miss Renaut and Rev. S. F. and Mrs. Whitehouse, he also spoke in affectionate terms.

"On every hand our work was spreading. We were baptizing forty or fifty believers every year; and in a few years we should have been baptizing them by hundreds. Why do we not make the work self-supporting? We do all we can; and in a little while, so far as the native churches were concerned, it would have been self-supporting."

A MESSAGE TO THE CHURCH.

The memorial address was given by Rev. Dr. RICHARD GLOVER (Bristol). "It is well," he said," to consider God's special dealings of a kind so critical, so strange, dealings that seem to challenge thought, and to require reconsideration on our part, of our neglects, our duties, and our opportunities. It has been my privilege to know most of those who have fallen, and I endorse, with all my heart, the judgment of approval which has fallen from the lips of Mr. Sowerby. Counting the wives of missionaries as missionaries, as we ought to do on account of the value of their work, we have lost twelve. . . . We are more deeply indebted than we know to the children of missionaries. They bring love, and freshness, and sweet forgetfulness to the hearts of labourers. One child was described as the salvation of our Shantung Mission. Mr. Farthing's three children were martyrs to the cause they hardly understood.

"We remember our native converts, of whom we should hardly have ventured to expect such daring, and such preference for death with Christ. We do not yet know the dimensions of our losses. The persecution may reach dimensions as large as that under Nero or Diocletian. The facts go to our hearts, challenge our sympathy, stir our conscience, and move us to ask what in these circumstances God demands at our hands. We must sorrow: not to sorrow were not to love. Yet it is not sorrow alone that gathers us here: we weep with the living who weep, and rejoice with the dead who do rejoice.

"What should be our thought, our attitude, our feeling with regard to those that have fallen? (1) We are here to express our thankful approval of the choice that led them to mission work, and of the steadfastness that enabled them to die in the Saviour's honour. (2) Amid sorrow we have to rejoice with the dead. (3) We rejoice in their heavenly reward. (4) The experience of our brethren calls for self-examination, and for consecration. Facts like these are like Jacob's Angel wrestling with us, and should leave us better. There is a question whether we are dividing our labour aright. These brethren were the messengers of the Church. They call to us, their partners in the other ship, to come and help them. Is it right that some should give their lives for Christ, and we the crumbs that fall from our table?"

The Armenian Outlook.

SO many mournful appeals have of late been made on behalf of Van and its province, that it is gratifying to learn of the improved prospects of the work under the direction of Dr. Raynolds. That the orphanages render valuable service to the province is evidenced by the fact that recently thirteen of the elder boys were sent out from them, furnished with diplomas to undertake the management of village schools. Dr. Raynolds also tells of the

of his efforts by the Armenian clergy. To quote his own words:—

The Bishop has spoken in the kindest and most appreciative terms of the work we have been doing, both in relief and on educational lines. He had become thoroughly convinced that our object was to secure the good of the Armenian people, and that we had no concealed ulterior motive, no axe to grind. That we took the children, gave them a thoroughly good and useful education, and gave them back to the nation. "Hence," said he, "this school is your school, this room (we use it also as a chapel) is your room"; and he publicly gave me the right hand of fellowship.

Thanks to the good harvest in the province of Van, the general condition of the people is improved, but the sorrowful fact remains that the villagers in their desperate need last winter in advance, and in some cases their fields, to the Kurds, at ruinous rates, for food. In consequence, the winter and spring will mean suffering and distress to many. So much has been effected by the money so long and generously subscribed by supporters of the Women's Armenian Relief Fund, that the committee look with confidence for further help for the Industrial Bureau, which gives employment and wages to widows and young girls. It is gratifying to find that, in spite of the numberless claims upon Christian philanthropy during the year, Armenia has not been forgotten or neglected.

The hon. treasurer of the Women's Armenian Relief Fund is Mrs. Madeleine Cole, Danehurst, Putney, S.W.

The Bible in Argentina.

BEYOND all question, one of the greatest ideas brought forward since the constitution of the Argentine people as a free nation, is that suggested and advocated by the Minister of Justice and Public Instruction, Dr. Osvaldo Magnasco, in his Message to Congress which accompanied the project of Educational Reform, dated June 5, 1899. The Minister has received many letters of congratulation from England, the United States, and Canada, and quite a number of leading papers and reviews have warmly commended the statements contained in this Message, and have praised the action of the Minister.

In January last an address was presented to the Minister, bearing over 300 signatures of leading capitalists, bankers, and merchants, with the clergy of the English, American, and German Churches, and the agents of the American Bible Society, and the British and Foreign Bible Society, in which gratitude is expressed for the progress indicated by the change now carried into effect. One paragraph of the Message which is specially singled out is translated as follows:—

"The Executive is very far from pretending to advocate a system of odious and exclusive preferences, incompatible with the declarations of our constitution, and much less to practise the monstrosity of the imposition of particular dogmas; for it is evident that this would be as serious an evil as is the wild scepticism to which our scholars and students have been carelessly and blindly abandoned. The Executive is unable, for reasons which will be easily understood, to introduce innovations in this direction, and therefore confines itself to the expression of an earnest desire for the advent of an epoch in which—imitating England and Germany—the unprejudiced reading of the Bible shall constitute one of the most delightful and edifying occupations of our public schools."

In his reply Dr. Magnasco acknowledges with satisfaction the cordial approval with which the proposal was met. Rev. William C. Morris assures us that it is the first occasion in the history of any South American Republic in which an Executive has had the wisdom and courage to advocate such a measure.

The Balaghat Mission.

THE work of the Balaghat Mission (an unattached and unsectarian effort to evangelize the Gonds, and other peoples of the Balaghat District of the Central Provinces, India) continues to make progress. There is no other Christian work existing in the district, which has a population of 400,000. The Mission was founded in 1893, by Mr. John Lampard, and has had a considerable measure of God's blessing, a Christian community of some scores of souls having arisen. The work is carried on in a simple and economical manner, the entire cost of maintenance of each English missionary being less than £50 per annum. There are at present six English and several native workers in three stations, each of which has a school, and regularly organised Sabbath services and evangelistic effort among the heathen. There are also a Famine Orphanage, and an Industrial Farm. Industrial instruction is given to the boys in the Orphanage while they are being taught the usual school subjects. Among the seventy new cases recently received, are five big lads who have had from two to three years' instruction in carpentering, shoemaking, washerman's work, gardening and tailoring. The mission farm is an embryo school of agriculture. It is hoped that every child will have a means of livelihood when old enough to leave the mission.

The workers on the field have been graciously sustained during the year of famine, and have been enabled to carry out considerable relief operations, aiding, on an average, nearly a thousand persons during a great part of the year.

Mr. and Mrs. Lampard, the superintendents of the work, are returning to Gondland this month, taking with them one or two new workers. Mr. Lampard's address is 114, Clapton Common, N.E.

Christmas Cards.—Miss M. C. Turner, 3, Elm Avenue, Nottingham, will be grateful for Christmas cards, new or old if clean and bright. They are used for distribution in workhouses, &c., and for scrap-books, which are sent out to missionary hospitals and schools. "Private" cards are not suitable.—One of the county secretaries of the Christmas Letter Mission, will be grateful if old Christmas cards are sent her for the lunatics of a county asylum, of whom there are 500 Address, Mrs. Ripley, Minster Lovell Vicarage, Witney, Oxon.

Mount Hermon School.

WE have from time to time called attention to the great educational institutions founded by the late Mr. Moody. Occasion now offers to refer particularly to the Mount Hermon School for young men.

Mount Hermon is in Massachusetts, on the banks of the Connecticut River, opposite Northfield, Mr. Moody's home. Many friends of Mr. Moody in Great Britain helped him to build this School. Crossley Hall, for the accommodation of 200 students, was built by the late Mr. Frank Crossley, of Manchester. Overtoun Hall is named in honour of Lord Overtoun, of Glasgow, who contributed largely to its erection. The New Memorial Chapel was the gift of Mr. Moody's friends in England and America on his sixtieth birthday. These and other great gifts from the British Isles make it specially fitting that the young men of Great Britain should know of the opportunities offered there, and the possibility of their taking advantage of them.

The aim of Mount Hermon School is to furnish a thorough Christian education to young men of earnest purpose but small means. In Mr. Moody's own words, the School seeks "to help young men of very limited means to get an education such as would have done me good when I was their age." Several hundred English boys have been students at Mount Hermon since it was founded in 1881. Very few such have returned to take up their life work in their native land. Some have done this, but nearly all have remained in America to take advantage of some of the many opportunities that open before them in that great land. British Hermon boys are now to be found in America in almost all the professions, and in nearly all departments of commercial life.

To a reliable boy who has an honest purpose and desire to make something of himself, Mount Hermon offers every encouragement. We are glad to say that no young man of willing hands and honest heart need be deprived of an education there, though he may have little money. It is to be understood, however, that the School does not offer scholarship aid to any extent. Its purpose is to teach young men to help themselves, and to assist them in doing so. The charge per term is only 11 guineas, which pays for board, tuition, and all expenses except text-books. From its beginning the School has always had more students applying for admission than it could accommodate. The enrolment last year was over 600.

There will be no vacancies until the term opening May 1, 1901. At that time places will be reserved by special arrangement for young men from Great Britain who wish to enter then, and whose applications are accepted.

The Principal of Mount Hermon School, Mr. H. F. Cutler, will be in London for several weeks, and those who wish for a prospectus of the School, or for further information, should address him to the care of Morgan and Scott, 12, Paternoster Buildings, London, E.C.

The Galveston Catastrophe.

EVER since the awful catastrophe in Galveston, Texas, I have been pressed in spirit to visit this sorrow-stricken and widely-bereaved city, in order to minister the comforts of the Gospel to the afflicted people. It would not have been well to enter upon this mission any sooner. The awful shock to brain and heart is not quickly overcome. The dead must needs be disposed of, and the living provided with food and shelter; thereafter comes the period of loneliness and heart-sickness, when the glad tidings of the great salvation is more readily appreciated.

I am credibly informed that from 10,000 to 15,000 perished in the storm. This means many thousand living mourners. More than 4,000 houses have been swept away, and many thousands more have suffered damage.

Our Lord preached the Gospel to the poor, and healed "the broken-hearted." This precious ministry I am now seeking in some measure to fulfil among this people. I realize how deeply important it is to preach, to those who sorrow for their dead, the blessed hope of resurrection and reunion at the coming of our Lord Jesus.

I am now holding services twice daily, having begun in the Jewish Synagogue—and now occupying the large hall of the Y.M.C.A. The church buildings are in ruins, and it will be some time before the scattered congregations can be gathered. Many church members were swept into eternity.

I am here at my own charges, believing that the gracious Lord will supply all needs. Pastors and Christian workers have given me hearty welcome. Already we see signs of blessing in the work of conversion. The desolation is fearful to behold. Thousands of the dead were cremated. One hundred bodies were found yesterday in a swamp neighbourhood.

American Notes.

THE sermon preached by Bishop Potter last Friday (Nov. 23), is likely to prove an historic utterance in view of its probable effect upon the future of the city. The Bishop is one of the most prominent Churchmen in the land, and one of the most dignified and conservative. When such a man calmly suggests that a committee similar to that of the Vigilantes of San Francisco in the days of the gold rush should be organized, to comprise 25,000 men, the whole city will not only be likely to feel sure that a real need for a desperate remedy exists, but is likely to take some decisive action in regard to it.

The exact words of this part of the discourse were these:—"If in New York to-morrow there could be organized a vigilance committee, such as was in San Francisco, of 25,000 men sworn to service for three years and pledged by night and day, when their business and their opportunities gave them the freedom for it, to see for themselves whether our soul had been smitten with the sorrow of that little victim of five years who was picked up in the street the other day in broad daylight, and ravished by some brute who had lived here, would such things be possible in a decent and Godfearing community? In this warfare, men and brethren, if it is to be a triumphant warfare, we must enlist for life. Pray God to kindle in you the flame of a divine indignation, and keep it burning with the enduring power of a divine and unflinching sacrifice."

The meeting of the Chamber of Commerce on Tuesday (Nov. 27), called in response to Bishop Potter's appeal, was attended by 300 gentlemen whose names represented influence, wealth, and social power. It included men who had served the country, the State, or the city in high official capacities, men who have achieved prominence in finance, trade, and the professions, as well as ministers and others whose life work keeps them face to face with the vice, crime, and misery of the city. The proceedings were opened by Mr. Morris K. Jesup, chairman of the Chamber of Commerce, and Mr. Charles Stewart Smith presided over the meeting which adopted a resolution—appointing a committee whose duty it shall be carefully to watch the actions of the constituted authorities, whether or not they will perform to their full extent the duty imposed upon them by law, to prevent and to eradicate vice in every form.

Services have been held at the Old Jerry McAuley Mission, 316, Water Street, to commemorate the twenty-eighth anniversary of that useful institution.

"Sam" Hadley, who succeeded Jerry McAuley as superintendent, described his conversion through Jerry's instrumentality, twenty-five years ago, mentioning that he had then 125 forgeries hanging over his head. Many converts of the Mission, "old" and recent, gave testimonies that gave ample evidence of good work well done, extending over many years.

On Monday morning, after exploring the dark corridors of two floors in a tenement house in the heart of the Chinese quarter, I succeeded in finding the living apartments of Miss Helen F. Clark, the devoted Director of the Evangel Band, which chiefly works among the Italians and Chinese who live in the vicinity. Miss Clark is the only American lady who knows all the Chinese women in "Chinatown," of whom there are about sixty, three of whom are slaves. These are mostly pagans, although some of them profess a degree of belief in what Miss Clark tells them of the Gospel. Language limitations on both sides make it difficult to know just how much real success is attained with adults, but with the children—both Chinese and Italian—the results are much more satisfactory.

Reform in Spain and Portugal.

THE Evangelical work associated in the minds of English Christians with the name of the late Archbishop Plunket continues to grow and develop with steady strength. In Spain the past three years have been a time of great national and ecclesiastical unrest, as the war with America caused an ultramontane reaction, and the immigration of the religious orders whose rule brought ruin in the Philippine Islands. In villages and towns missions have been conducted with the special object of rousing hostility to the Reformers, and local authorities have done their utmost to secure the closing of schools and rooms where the Gospel is preached. The Reformers have held together in the face of all opposition, and new congregations have been formed through the missionary zeal of the members.

In Portugal the growth has been more rapid and healthy than even the warmest friends of the work anticipated. In the chief cities it is no unusual thing to find congregations consisting of hundreds of converts and their children, meeting together regularly for the worship of God in accordance with his will revealed in Holy Scripture. The zeal of the Reformers is beyond all praise, and their Bible classes, prayer meetings, and organizations for tract distribution bear witness to their devotion and self-denying enthusiam for righteousness. The only hope for Spain and Portugal lies in the Gospel, and all who work in the Reformed Churches were born in the Peninsula. The Spanish and Portuguese Church Aid Society, Church House, Westminster, is unfortunately in great need of funds to make the necessary grants to the struggling congregations.

Countess Schimmelmann's Work.

THE Countess Schimmelmann sends tidings of "more blessing than ever on our tour in Germany. I see in my meetings the aristocracy, even royalty, mingling with the working classes. The meetings draw great crowds, and we see the most striking conversions." The work is much hindered by the opposition of those who disapprove of women preaching. She, however, braved the situation at Karlsruhe, by hiring the hall and paying all expenses herself. "The result was overwhelming, reaching to the most important persons in Germany."

In March she purposes coming to England for a period of refreshment extending over three weeks. Invitations have already been received from Brighton and York, but a number of dates are open, and friends desiring to be visited are invited to communicate with the Countess Schimmelmann, at Villa Helleback, Helleback, Denmark.

The White Slave Traffic.

A LARGE and influential meeting was held in Vienna on Tuesday, December 4, at the residence of Baroness de Langenau, with the object of organizing an Austrian native committee for the suppression of the international trade in young women for immoral purposes. Among those present were five representatives of the Prefecture of Police, and three officials from the Ministry of the Interior. The meeting was addressed by Mr. W. A. COOTE, secretary of the English National Vigilance Association. He stated that committees had already been founded in nearly all the capitals of Europe. He had received an assurance that the Austrian Government looked with favour upon all efforts to suppress this abominable traffic. He believed that international legislation dealing with the persons by whom it was carried on would have a most salutary effect. At the close of the address a strong committee was formed.

Argentina.—Mr. George Smith, of Buenos Aires, urges upon the attention of Christian people at home the greatness of the present opportunity in Argentina, "as the people tire of Roman Catholicism, and want something more satisfying." Specially wide is the opening among the children. "What is required is plenty of children's meetings, and very cheap—better than quite free, unless among the very poor—day schools taught by real earnest Christians seeking the salvation of the children."

Some Christmas Associations.

CHRISTMAS has come again, bringing with it many happy pleasures, and beautiful memories. Let us think a little about some of the things which are always associated with this glad time.

First of all, there is Light.

In the long ago the ancients used to think Christmas Day was the birthday of the sun, and after all I do not think they were very far wrong, because at Christmas time we celebrate the birthday of Him whom the Bible calls the "Sun of Righteousness."

This, I think, is why there is so much light and brightness just now. We like to light up for Christmas. We should think nothing of a Christmas tree if it was not ablaze with candles. So the meaning of all the light that we have at Christmas is just this—that He who came to earth that wondrous night so long ago is the "Light of the World." When you see the lamps lighted, and the Christmas tree with its flaming candles, I want them to remind you of the world's great Light.

A strange scene happens in a German town on Christmas Eve, at the Cathedral there. They do not light up the Cathedral; it is in total darkness. After a time the people come, and each one brings a candle which they set light to, and so gradually the Cathedral becomes full of brilliance. The people bring the candles in honour of Christ. It is a pretty custom, and it suggests that as these candles light up the Cathedral, Christ can Light up our hearts which are his real temples, and where He loves to dwell. Christ is the best Light that we have at Christmas.

Another thing that is associated with Christmas is Music and Singing.

Never do we have so much music as at Christmas. Songs and hymns are sung with more than usual gladness. Carol-singers come to our doors, the sweet music of the waits is heard in the midnight air. Now, why is there so much singing? It is because everyone is so glad Christ came. It is because the angels sang the first Christmas song, and so ever since singing has been associated with Christmas. You know what the angel carol-singers sang about, the words of their song will never grow old. "Glory to God in the highest; peace on earth; good will toward men." When you listen to the beautiful Christmas songs, always remember that we have so much singing at this time of the year because we are so glad Christ came, and do not forget to put the song of the angels into practice, and give "glory to God in the highest."

Then too, Gifts are associated with Christmas. We give presents to one another. We take pleasure in choosing some little token of love for our friends. Nearly all countries celebrate Christmas by giving gifts to each other. Why is this? I think it must be because the wise men first commenced the custom by giving presents to Christ. You know what the wise men gave to Jesus. One of them brought gold. Gold was very much thought of in Eastern lands. It was considered a proper present for a king, and so it was given to Christ because He was born "King of the Jews." The second wise man gave a very peculiar thing to the infant Saviour—frankincense. This is a kind of scent that comes from the bark of trees. It is rare and difficult to obtain. There always seems a kind of mystery about it; so it was given to show the Divinity of Christ, that he was the Son of God.

Then the last present that was given was myrrh. Myrrh is also obtained from a rare tree. It is used for a perfume and a medicine. It was given to show the humanity of Christ, that He was a real little child. These were the first Christmas presents, and ever since then people have continued to give gifts.

Do you not think you would like to give some gift to Jesus this Christmas-time? You cannot give such expensive gifts as the wise men, but you can give the best gift, and that is yourselves, to Christ. An old carol says:—

> What can I give Him, poor as I am?
> If I were a shepherd, I would bring a lamb.
> If I were a wise man, I would do my part,
> Yet what can I give Him? Give Him my heart.

When you spend Christmas Day, 1900, the last of this century, think of all it means for you. The light because Jesus is the true Light of Christmas; the singing, for the gladness we feel that He came; and the gifts, because He is God's Gift to us; and in return we must give our hearts as our gift to Him.

The Wooden Spoon.

A CHRISTMAS FABLE FOR THE YOUNGSTERS.

I.

THERE was a terrible jangling in the plate basket! Big forks and little forks, fat spoons and tiny spoons, spoons with round bowls, spoons with oval, spoons with a straight back, spoons with crooked, spoons plain, and spoons prettily designed, large and small, one and all were engaged in a great discussion.

It was near Christmas time, and one of the smallest of the members of the plate basket had asked: "Who's to stir the Christmas pudding?" For you must know that the making of that wonderful plum pudding was a great event in the kitchen. Cook prepared the ordinary everyday puddings for the nursery, but some weeks before Santa Claus' visit did Mistress herself attend to the pudding that is only made once a year. What a chopping and a stoning, what a rinsing and a mincing, what ringings at the area bell when the raisins, or the currants, or the suet, or the flour, or the eggs, or the sugar, or the candied peel, arrived! What a huge basin to mix the pudding in!

But the discussion in the plate basket still went on.

"I shall mix the pudding," said the large soup-ladle in his deep voice, "because I'm tall."

"I don't know so much about that," squeaked the tiniest salt spoon. "When mistress has breakfast in bed I always go up on the tray. I'm her favourite."

"If it comes to that," put in the tea spoon, "it would be one of us, because we see more service than any of you." The egg spoon because she was pretty, and the gravy and dessert and vegetable spoons also joined in. In this way these silly jealous spoons argued and got angry: even the forks thought they too might be used.

II.

At last the eventful day came. Everything was ready to be mixed. Cook stood in her large white apron beaming on the array of all the good things that constitute fine puddings.

There was great excitement in the plate basket as to who would be chosen. The attitude of the big ones was bold and defiant, the hearts of the little ones sank nearly to where their boots would have been, only spoons do not wear boots.

Mistress had come downstairs, and said, "Is all ready, cook?" and walked over to the dresser where the plate basket stood, and took, not one of those anxious, jealous ones, but from a hook above, an old, almost forgotten, dirty looking, cracked wooden spoon, hung up by a bit of string, and stirred the pudding with it.

III.

Needless to say, on Christmas Day, in the large dining-room, the silver spoons on the table, polished and bright in their very best suits, heard all the guests declare that the pudding was the very best they had ever tasted.

Humiliated and crestfallen those handsome spoons and forks went to bed in the plate basket that night, having learned that loud words and proud manners are not needed in order to be useful.

Although worthless to stir Christmas puddings, the large silver ladle found that no one else but he was used to help the soup; the forks discovered that none could do their particular work better; the dessert spoons resolved to do what was required of them to the best of their ability; and the little spoons were forced to admit that in exercising patience they were not forgotten, but each in his turn was called upon to fulfil the purpose for which he was made.

Boys and girls, we are all spoons and forks in this great mixed world, and if disappointed and inclined to be jealous, let us determine by God's help to be patient, and meantime fulfil the tasks set before us with all our might, however lowly they be.

Ernest Oxford.

Christmas Angels.

Glory in the highest glory!
Sang the angels long ago;
"Peace on earth," how sweet the story,
Echoing still 'midst sin and woe!

Listen: for they still are singing,
As they sang that Christmas morn;
Unto all good tidings bringing,
Unto you the Christ is born.

O ye children, blithe and merry,
In his temple fair to-day,
Decked with holly leaf and berry,
At his feet your offerings lay:

Hearts that lovingly adore Him,
Lips that join the angels' song,
Head and hands and feet before Him,
That shall serve Him all day long.

Then, dear children, though not flying
Through the cloven skies of blue,
Unto those in sorrow sighing
You may be God's angels too.

To some little sufferer weary
Be his messengers of love,
Seek to fill some dwelling dreary
With the light of heaven above.

Maybe, some in sickness pining
Need your gifts this winter wild;
Be to such as angels shining
Of the bountiful Christ Child.

Then 'midst carol, feast, or playing,
Merriest of all you'll be,
Since you'll hear Him to you saying,
"Ye have done it unto Me."

Harriet Julia Evans.

Preparing for Christmas.

We think of the little children,
The toys for the Christmas tree;
The things that will give them pleasure,
And raise their glad shouts of glee.
Do we think of the Christ of children?
The Lord who was once a boy?
Do we seek to prepare for Jesus,
The things that will give Him joy?

We think of the poor and needy,
And furnish the Christmas board;
The garments to clothe the naked,
The feasts where no feast is stored.
Do we think of the homeless Saviour,
Who knocks at a thousand doors;
And fails of a heart's glad welcome,
And hungers amid our stores?

We think of the loved and precious,
And purchase the gifts we think
Will give them the satisfaction
And tighten Love's golden link.
Do we think of the Chief of Lovers,
And gifts for his heart prepare;
The best of our Christmas presents,
For our dearest Friend to share?

In all our preparations,
Let us think of Him first of all;
And the things that we do for others,
Let us do them at his glad call.
But think for a moment, children,
If you cannot make for Him
A Christmas preparation
Unknown to the seraphim—

Do you ask what preparation
Will gladden Him most of all?
A heart by his blood made holy—
A will before Him to fall—
A love that will give Him resting—
The home that He seeks to share.
Oh, let us all this Christmas
For our Christmas Christ prepare!

A New Children's Magazine.—If the boys and girls will turn to page 20, they will find the portrait of one who wishes to be a real friend to every one of them. He is the editor of a monthly magazine, Uncle Ben's Budget (1d., Morgan & Scott). We hope all the children will read it, and also recommend it to their friends. If any family should experience difficulty in getting a copy, the publishers will be glad to send a specimen, post free, on the fact being made known to them. Beginning with the "Tiny Tots' Corner," every page is bright and interesting. The stories will be read eagerly; and those who are old enough to appreciate history will be charmed with "England's Gospel Dawn." The illustrations are most attractive, while the text—painting and picture—describing competitions will afford a fine opportunity for those who delight in using their pens or boxes of colours. Notes on daily Bible readings and other thoughtful articles will be welcomed by those who love the Word of God; and all those who wish to help in making the magazine known will find the explanation of a plan by which their efforts need not go unrewarded.

TOPIC FOR DECEMBER 23.

THE GLORY OF CHRIST.—JOHN I. 1-14.

IT is befitting at this season of the year, when men are naturally attracted to the manger-bed of the infant Saviour, that they should be reminded of the dazzling glory of his nature. As the Babe lies in Mary's arms, It is so exactly like other babes, in its helplessness and simplicity, that we require the sublime teaching of these opening sentences of the Fourth Gospel to balance the testimony of our senses. In the whole course of this world's literature, and even in the Holy Scriptures themselves, I suppose it would be impossible to find another passage in which the simple and the sublime are so absolutely blended. The Glory of Christ is apparent, as we study the titles, which are here given to Him.

THE WORD (1, 2). As the words we speak reveal our inmost character, so Jesus is the speech of the invisible God. He has uttered, or declared God. The Psalmist said that the heavens declare the glory of God, and the firmament showeth his handiwork to the ends of the world. But in the fairest panorama of star-bejewelled heavens, or sunset clouds, there was never such a presentation of God's nature as we have in Him who lay as a Babe in Mary's arms.

THE CREATOR (3). Dipping his brush in the strongest language he could command, the apostle inscribes the name of Jesus on all things that are in heaven above and in the earth beneath. The iron of which the nails were made that transfixed Him to the cross; the wood of the cross, when it sprang as a young sapling in the forest; the thorns which composed his crown, were all due to his creative fiat (Let it be). What wonder that He had the key to nature, so that it obeyed Him, and yielded up to Him her stores!

THE RESERVOIR OF LIFE (4). As one with the Father in the Holy Trinity, life was an original quality of his being. But it pleased the Father that life should reside in his human nature, as its cistern and reservoir (see John v. 26), so that out of Him we should derive the eternal life, which is communicated through faith.

THE LIGHT (4, 5). John the Baptist was a great and good man; he was sent from God for a very special work in the world, which rendered him, in our Saviour's estimate, among the greatest born of women; but he is not to be mentioned in the same category as the Saviour. "He was not that Light." Sometimes in photography, a tall man is placed against the pediment of some great statue to give an idea of its size; so John the Baptist is used to set forth the overwhelming greatness of Jesus the Christ. On the Mediterranean at night, the wake of the vessel is marked by long translucent furrows of water. This is known as phosphorescence, and is due to the presence of myriads of minute creatures. In these life is light. All life should be light. But it was so pre-eminently in our Lord.

THE MESSIAH (10, 11). He came unto his own. Whilst they looked for Him at the front door He quietly entered at the back; but since He did not come in the precise guise in which He was expected, his own nation would not look at Him. They judged by the sight of their eyes, and the hearing of their ears.

SHEKINAH (14). "He tabernacled among us," says the Apostle, "and we beheld his glory." When Moses essayed to enter the olden tabernacle, he was driven forth by the insufferable splendour; so now and again, during our Lord's earthly career, the curtains of his human nature seemed to part and emit some gleams of the radiant splendour of his Being. It was so on the Transfiguration Mount; and in his resurrection and ascension. But the glory was full of grace and truth. Remember that the sweet gentleness and uncompromising truth of Jesus were the most conspicuous evidences of his glory.

ONLY BEGOTTEN SON (12, 14). We, thank God, may be sons, but He was the Son. Whatever is implied in the phrase "only begotten," we know that He is separated by a measureless and impassable chasm from the saintliest and noblest of the children of men. He gives us the right to become sons; but his Sonship depends on an eternal generation. Yet how wonderful it is, that He is not ashamed to call us brethren. However familiar you may be with the Master, be sure to think and speak of Him with profound respect and homage. F. B. M.

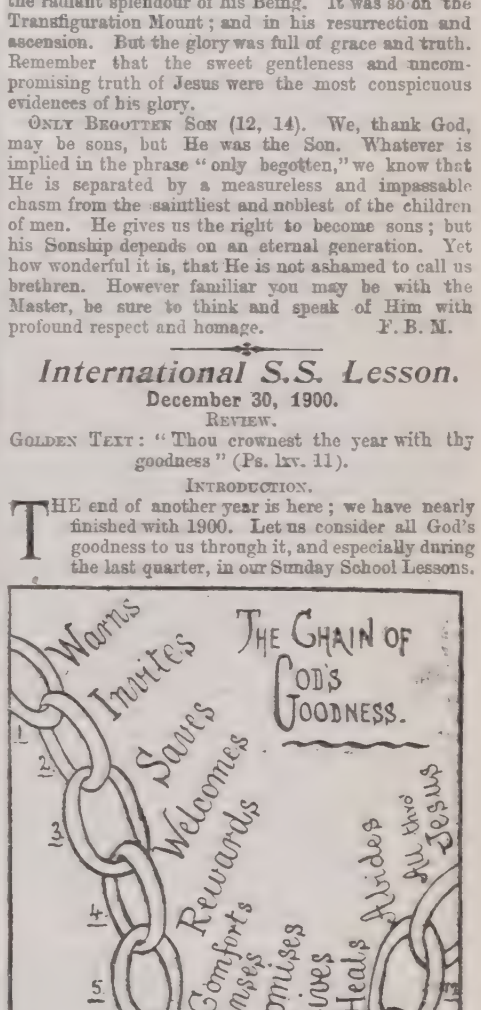
REVIEW.

GOLDEN TEXT: "Thou crownest the year with thy goodness" (Ps. lxv. 11).

INTRODUCTION.

THE end of another year is here; we have nearly finished with 1900. Let us consider all God's goodness to us through it, and especially during the last quarter, in our Sunday School Lessons.



Key to Blackboard Plan.—We have here a chain, and we shall find how Sunday by Sunday a link has been added till we have twelve links, one within the other, telling us of all God's goodness.

FIRST LINK.

The lesson about choosing the chief seats warns us against pride, one of the things we read is an abomination to the Lord (Prov. vi. 16, 17; xvi. 5).

SECOND LINK.

The invitation to "come" (Gen. vii. 1; Rev. xxii. 17). Between these two texts the word "come" rings out again and again. What is your answer? Is it "Excuse me" or is it "Yes, Lord, I come"?

THIRD LINK.

This teaches us although lost we may be found, that is "saved." The sheep strayed, the coin fell, but both were found and saved (Acts xvi. 31).

FOURTH LINK.

Not only does He save, but He welcomes the returning sinner. Have you let Him give you a welcome? (Psa. ciii. 8; John vi. 37).

FIFTH LINK.

The faithful servant shall be rewarded; the one who is ready, who has prepared for the future life, shall be rewarded (Matt. xxv. 21, 23).

Sixth Link.

God is ever a God of comfort (2 Cor. i. 3). We may have much to put up with and bear here below, but the picture of heaven we have in this link is a place of peace, and rest, and happiness (John xiv. 2).

Seventh Link.

The Christian is saved by trusting Jesus, but he needs cleansing from the dirt and filth of sin, and prepared for his future home, where all is holiness and purity (Ps. li. 2-10).

Eighth Link.

God has many promises (30,000) in his Word for us, and here is one of the best, the promise of his coming again. Are we ready to meet Him? Are we living the sober and godly life? (Titus ii. 12).

Ninth Link.

God gives, God is the Great Giver, and the greatest gift He has given is "Eternal Life in his Son." Is it yours? Have you claimed it? (1 John v. 11, 13, 20).

Tenth Link.

Another great gift from God is "sight," both for body and soul. It is sad to be blind with our bodily eyes, it is sadder to be soul-blind. God alone can give us the eye of faith to see Him and his Son Jesus (John xiv. 9).

Eleventh Link.

"Abides"—blessed link to link us to God. He abides in us and we abide in Him (1 John iii. 24). Let Him abide with you, will you?

Twelfth Link.

"Jesus."

How sweet the name of Jesus sounds
In a believer's ear;
It soothes his sorrows, heals his wounds,
And drives away his fear.

Jesus: for He save his people from their sins. Jesus, Emmanuel: God with us. We will take "Jesus only" to be our motto for 1901.

Scottish Notes.

REPORTS show that a general canvass which is being carried out by the Sabbath School Unions of the West of Scotland is proving satisfactory. Recent evangelistic missions among children have produced good results. A new Sabbath School Union has been formed at Leslie, in Fifeshire.

Rev. Mr. Macaskill (Dingwall) has just addressed to his congregation a pastoral letter which has a wider interest. He claims that in his ministry of seventeen years he has not deviated from the message he first delivered to them—Christ in his three-fold office as Prophet, Priest, and King—and then proceeds to express the pain he feels at the bitter feeling spreading in the Highlands. He points out that the only remedy for the present miserable state of dissension and division is to be found in an outpouring of the Holy Spirit, "to turn men's minds from thoughtless controversy to the higher interests of their souls' salvation and the winning of the world to Christ." He is quite frank about "the misrepresentation that we have thrown the Catechisms overboard. The second declaration attached to the Uniting Act shows the falsity of this statement. Formerly they were directories for catechising; now they are manuals for religious instruction."

It is an interesting fact that though during the past year the Glasgow Magdalene Institution dealt with fifteen cases more than during the preceding twelve months, the committee were enabled to close the year with twelve persons fewer in the homes. This was accomplished through the satisfactory disposal of ninety-six cases—forty-five women being restored to parents or friends, fifty placed in domestic service or other situations, and one sent abroad. The year opened with 124 inmates, and the admissions numbered 150, making 274 cases dealt with. At the meeting last week, Sir John Neilson Cuthbertson called attention to the fact that through the general diffusion of education nearly all the girls received can now read and write. Formerly it was remarked that nearly all were of Irish nationality, but this is now changed, only six during the past year hailing from Ireland. Dieting and clothing cost less than £12 a year per inmate. The cost is mainly defrayed by the work carried on; and it is gratifying to know that though subscriptions fell off somewhat, the amount received was found sufficient.

Some months ago a largely attended conference was held in Edinburgh on the subject of Christian Unity. A committee was then appointed to draw up a statement for publication, which has just appeared. The conviction is expressed that the lack of visible unity among Christian people, "is one of the chief hindrances by which all efforts to advance the Kingdom of our Lord are impeded;" and recognition made of the urgent call for combination presented by "the infidelity, the neglect of God, the self-sufficiency, the pride, the love of money, the impurity, the intemperance, the worldliness, and other evils by which we are confronted." Joy is expressed at the amount of visible unity already realized, but it is pointed out as obvious that "in its completeness" that has yet to be accomplished. Before taking steps to obtain, if possible, the setting apart of some day in the year 1901, as a day of prayer and intercession in this matter, the committee are desirous of ascertaining how far their desire finds a response in the hearts and minds of their fellow Christians, and all who are willing to support the movement, are desired to send in their names not later than February 15, 1901.

Welsh Notes.

IT is a matter for rejoicing that the Welsh branch of the Christian Endeavour Society in Liverpool is gradually winning the support of one Welsh denomination after another. At the recent annual meeting it was announced that the Welsh Wesleyans of the city have given in their adhesion to the Society, and hopes were expressed that the Welsh Baptists would soon follow.

One regrettable result of the quarrymen's strike in Carnarvonshire is the depopulation of whole villages, and the consequent weakening and possible extinction of churches supported almost entirely by quarrymen. On a recent Sunday in one or two chapels there was an almost entire absence of males, while the women and children present were soon destined to follow their husbands and fathers, who had gone to seek employment elsewhere.

The St. Asaph Board of Guardians have just done a graceful and kindly act. At a recent meeting of the Board a special vote of thanks was accorded to the Rev. Benjamin Hughes for his faithful service to the old and infirm inmates of the workhouse. The visiting committee reported that Mr. Hughes, during the last fourteen years, had paid over 700 visits, and had only failed for two or three weeks in the whole of that period, and then through indisposition. Mr. Hughes, it may be added, is one of the oldest and best respected ministers in North Wales.

The steady growth and insidious inroads of Ritualism are only too evident even in Protestant Wales. It has now obtained a footing in a church which may be termed historically evangelical. Amongst the staunch upholders of the evangelical faith who have been incumbents of the church was the late Archdeacon Griffiths, a preacher of marked power, whose fame was throughout all the churches of South Wales. The church to which we refer is St. David's, Neath. Energetic action is being taken by the parishioners and communicants, and a petition protesting against Ritualistic innovations is contemplated.

In view of the fact that the National Free Church Council intends confining the sphere of the great Simultaneous Mission of February next to cities and large towns, it seems a pity that some attempt should not be made to bring smaller towns and even villages into the area of its activities. Possibly the best means to do this would be through the medium of the many Ministers' Unions which are scattered throughout the land. One such union—that of Llantrisant, Glamorganshire—has already commenced an evangelistic campaign.

The Season's Voices.

There are voices round us, in us,
Earnest voices, soft and clear,
Voiceless voices that would win us
Did we lend a list'ning ear.

Wordless whispers fondly urging Midst man's fratricidal strife,
Hard above the surf and surging,
Breaking on the shore of life.

Silent messages that reach us
Oft-times in our very tears,
Silent pleadings that should teach us
In life's oft-recurring years.

Hear ye not the voices stealing,
Feel ye not their potent spell?
Softly, then more loudly, pealing
Like a distant muffled bell.

Christian men, with gold unstinted,
Hark ye to the cry of need,
Let your gold in heaven be minted
In some noble holy deed.

Canst thou not some burden lighten,
Lifting off some load of care?
Surely there are hearts to brighten
Hopeless in their dark despair.

Soon thy life will have an ending,
Shall that life be lived in vain?
They who give to God are lending,
God will pay them back again.

The Barefoot Mission.

THE lower room of Exeter Hall presented an animated scene on a recent afternoon, when the Marquis of Northampton opened a sale of work on behalf of the Barefoot Mission section of the Ragged School Union's operations. Mr. Charles Montague stated that thirty-six working parties made garments for the cause. During the year there had been received 58,890 garments, 4,414 pairs of boots, 11,653 toys, 100,000 books and publications, 609 hospital letters, and many other things.

The Marquis of Northampton said that he was glad to see evidence of so much hard work, and he felt sure that no one would regret having done it. He came to declare the sale open, but he was also a very anxious seller A bird had whispered to him that the goods were cheap; but if purchasers gave 3s. for articles marked 2s. they would be giving the money to the cause. It was not necessary to say anything about the work; nothing was so strong as the word Barefoot on their cards; and that should bring home to them the necessities of the poor children. He would not give harrowing details; but there was a large amount of want and misery, and the Ragged School Union was the agency to relieve it. Certain articles promised by the Duchess of York had not arrived, but for those there would be a separate sale; the articles being valued for the sake of the sender, and also for the sake of her late mother, the Duchess of Teck, who had also been a friend of the poor.

Clonmel Soldiers' Home.

ON visiting the little Soldiers' Home at Clonmel, on my recent return from South Africa, I was cheered by finding it appreciated more than ever by the soldiers in garrison. I was, however, grieved to hear that the work was hindered through a lack of funds.

A sum of money has been collected towards obtaining a more spacious building, but not sufficient; also we want more annual subscribers, to enable us to keep the work going. I have met in many parts of the world soldiers who have spoken of blessing received in the "Little Home" in Clonmel. The lady resident, Miss Wood (Soldiers' Home, Clonmel, Ireland) will be glad to give further information.

—Yours faithfully,

S. Watson, Lieut.-Colonel,
Royal Field Artillery.

Young Women in the City.

A FEW evenings ago, the first anniversary of the Noon Rest Room, 61, Paternoster Row, E.C. (third floor), was celebrated. The occasion was marked by the presence of Ven. Archdeacon Sinclair, whose helpful address on the word "To-day, and how to spend it well," will be long remembered.

As the report showed, the Noon Rest Room is doing something to meet the need long felt by lady workers in the City, for some convenient place in which to shelter on cold and rainy days. But it does more than this, as it serves the purpose of a centre for social intercourse, as well as a dining-room where refreshments can be obtained at low rates. The membership fee is 3d. per week, or 2s. 6d. per quarter. This also entitles the member to the use of the library. The room is under the auspices of the Y.W.C.A., but is open to all lady workers, whether connected with the Y.W.C.A. or not. The record for the past year is an encouraging one, but the Rest Room requires to be more widely utilized to make it self-supporting.

During the summer several Saturday excursions have been arranged, and during the winter social evenings have proved most enjoyable. Visitors will be heartily welcomed to the Rest Room between the hours of 12 and 3 (Saturdays excepted), when they can see for themselves the advantages it affords.

Female Orphan Home, Hampton, Middlesex, has maintained for many years its ideal of a godly, safe, and happy shelter and school for training in true piety, and in a plain, practical and useful way, the young children who, bereaved of earthly fathers, have been committed to its care. An effort is being made to conclude the year free of debt. The secretary is Mr. J. D. Cooper, 79, Finsbury Pavement, E.C.

Mrs. Meredith's Institutions.

INDUSTRIAL HOME MISSIONS.

THIS difficult aspect of missions has to be faced, for, with some, industry seems as necessary as preaching is needful to bring souls to Christ. If they believe and we give them not the things that are needful for the body, "What doth it profit?" So missions that must combine the two have difficulties that those simply evangelizing are free from. It is often asked, is the combination really necessary? Let James ii. 16 give the answer.

The prison missionary who has visited the female prisoner in her cell, and given her work on discharge, can testify to the many who have gladly heard the voice of Jesus speak of pardon, life, and peace. He has also said to her, "Go and sin no more." Mrs. Meredith's Prison Mission has always been a bridge of hope to such, and, with the Master's blessing, a deliverance from the power of Satan to many. The laundry has recently, however, become a burden. There is plenty of work to do, and numbers of prisoners most willing to do it, but the increased the rise in all materials, fuel, light, &c., make it impossible to do it at the same prices as formerly, and constitute a difficulty hardly to be surmounted except by a grave reduction of the number of women we assist, or the addition of some other industry. This we think we have acquired already, but it calls for a large demand on the part of the Christian public, and a large supply on ours. We speak of our felt slippers, which are making their way and are much appreciated. Will friends try them and help to make them still more widely known?

But our great need now is to pay off our laundry bills. Mrs. Meredith thanks cordially all her friends who have so long helped her in the work of the Lord, and she is sure that they will rejoice with her in time to come over many erring ones who have found joy and rest in the ways of righteousness, and are walking in them even now, and she trusts that they will forgive her being importunate for assistance at this season.

Last Christmas we sent out 24,000 letters written to prisoners by the loving hands, and with the prayers of hundreds of the Lord's people. Each went forth in a separate envelope with the words "To you" written on it. In all languages the Gospel message was given to prisons all over the world. These arrows shot at a venture touch many a heart, hardened in sin, at a time when hearts are open to softening influences. Will you help forward this Mission, dear friends, with your money and your prayers? Do not let it languish for want of funds. We can but make mention of its needs to the Master, and tell the Lord's stewards of them.

NURSES' MEDICAL MISSION.

The number of Medical Missions in the countries as yet unevangelized is very small. It is only slowly being recognised by the Church of God that we must have them, if we would overtake time that has been lost.

Turkey presents immense difficulties to the preacher of Christ, but, even there, Medical Missions are tolerated, and the Gospel is freely preached in them. In Tangiers, last year the number of out-patients was 2,039, and of in-patients 205. All had Christ preached to them. We plead for Syria, and for

A POPULOUS CENTRE IN THE LEBANON.

There are only three Medical Mission hospitals in all Syria, a country larger than Scotland. The nearest Medical Mission hospital south of us is at Tiberias. An American missionary journal compares all medical missions to rays of light emanating from one huge light-house, the rays scattered by it streaming into the various countries of the globe whose inhabitants sit in darkness. It is a good simile; how many rays are needed to enlighten dark Africa and Asia, and especially do Bible lands need light. At Baakleen, in the Lebanon, we had 4,291 out-patients at the dispensary last year, and as many in-patients as our small hospital would hold. If we could build a ward for the men, it would never be empty. We get women and children easily, and when they are accustomed to associate medicine with cure, we shall have many more. Surgery they all feel to be an absolute necessity. The natives are mostly Druses, but people of all denominations, Mohammedans, Maronites, &c., come to us, and hear about Jesus, the Great Healer.

Two of our missionary ladies are trained nurses, and our doctor is a native—a Christian educated in Syria, with a Turkish diploma, and also a good teacher of the Word.

We ask for sympathy, and for assistance to make the necessary addition to our hospital, which will cost about £500. Towards this sum we have about £125 in hand; but, above all, we ask for prayer, that from the mountains of Lebanon much light may shine.

We call our Medical Mission a Nurses' Mission in order to emphasize the need there is for them. In England during the war in South Africa, we have learned this by sad experience, and in missionary warfare with the powers of darkness we need them no less. By the soothing touch and loving ministrations of Christian nurses, the Good Physician who will not forget the cup of cold water given in his Name, is best commended.

M. A. Lloyd, Hon. Sec.,

St. Luke's House.

OWING to the great number of applications for admission to the St. Luke's House, "the Home for the Dying" at 50, Osnaburgh Street, Regent's Park, it has been decided to extend the work, larger and better premises having been secured for the purpose, the cost of which is estimated at upwards of £1,000. The Home, which has proved an immense benefit to numbers, is entirely dependent upon voluntary contributions.

The Home is free, and is designed for the reception of those who, having seen "better days," are no longer able to provide themselves with the medical care and nursing that mortal disease demands. By helping on this work, hospitals are indirectly aided, as many of the cases received at St. Luke's House are those whom, owing to their hopeless condition, the hospitals are unable to retain, whilst, to send such to the infirmary would be derogatory; indeed, as is well known, many prefer to starve at home.

Communications may be addressed to the hon. sec., Mrs. Annesley, at 50, Osnaburgh Street, Regent's Park, N.W.

The After-care Association for Poor Persons Discharged Recovered from Asylums for the Insane is the only charity in the United Kingdom labouring among the 7,000 persons who come annually within the scope of its special object. Money and clothing are given to some, others are boarded out in the country, while for some employment is found—all being supplemented by personal sympathy and guidance suited to the individual cases. The secretary is Mr. H. Thornhill Roxby, Church House, Dean's Yard, Westminster, London, S.W.

Poplar Medical Mission.—A medical mission is being organized which will find its home in the schoolroom of Cotton Street Chapel, Poplar, E. Much good work has already been done in the distribution of clothing, food, medical appliances, &c.; and now a medical man has placed his services at the disposal of the workers. All the work will centre round Gospel services, and it is hoped to reach a large population at present outside Christian influence, formal, indifferent, and hostile. Further information on the subject may be obtained from Rev. J. J. Ellis, 109, Plashet Grove, East Ham.

Female Penitents at Brighton.—The Albion Hill Home, formerly the Brighton Home for Female Penitents, has, since its foundation in 1854, shielded, helped, and guided 2,350 young women, of whom nearly one-half have been placed in domestic service. Home industry contributes about one-half of the income available for the working of the institution, but its stability is endangered unless a larger income can be obtained from subscriptions. The number of girls in residence is usually about sixty, under the care of eight matrons. One worker says: "In the course of thirteen years' work, I have never seen a girl who was penitent at first. I don't think that often takes place till a girl has been in a Home more than a year, if then." The secretary is Rev. R. C. Macdonald, Home Villa, Queen's Park, Brighton.

The Y.M.C.A.

THE PRESIDENT'S ADDRESS.

SIR GEORGE WILLIAMS has once again issued a "New Year's Address." Its subject is "Spiritual Equipment." In the course of his address, the venerable president says:—

"Never was there a louder call than now for spiritually equipped men. Let us as Associations seek to supply this need. Truth, righteousness, peace, faith, and love should be the distinguishing features of our Christian character. It is in proportion as we translate these virtues into our daily life, that we commend the religion of Christ to those within the circle of our influence. I plead for Christian consistency throughout all our Associations. Said an intelligent young man of sceptical tendencies in the East End of London, 'I like this Jesus of yours, but what I cannot understand is, that those who profess to be his followers, aren't a bit like Him.'

"Brethren, shall we not, as members of the Y.M.C.A., show that, as far as we are concerned, there is no foundation for such a charge? We would not discourage speaking for Christ. God forbid. We should always be on the alert and speak 'the word in season' whenever the fitting opportunity occurs, but be it ever remembered that our words will be influential only in so far as they are consistent with our actions. There must be harmony between what we say and what we do.

"There is no power in the world more potent for good than the follower of Christ, who manifests his Spirit, and who embodies the principles of Christianity in his daily life. I rejoice to believe that there are thousands of such men to be found in our Associations, and pray that their number may be abundantly multiplied—nay, more, that every individual Y.M.C.A. member may be so 'strong in the Lord, and the power of his might,' as to be attractively recommending the religion of Christ by his consistent representation of it."

The mission band of the Sunderland Association have conducted a week's special services at Ravensworth Street Congregational Mission.

The Central Y.M.C.A. has again inaugurated its winter series of evangelistic meetings for men in the Tottenham Court Road. The large attendance on the opening night greatly encouraged the workers.

Rev. C. Musgrave Brown, of Liverpool, has conducted an encouraging mission at the Leeds Association. The meetings have been well attended, and promise greatly to benefit the work of the Association.

The Bishop of Hereford presided at the annual meeting of the Hereford Association, which was held in the Corn Exchange. Mr. Hind Smith, of London, addressed a large gathering, and the Bishop spoke in warm commendation of the work.

A ten days' series of special meetings for men has just been conducted by Mr. A. K. Yapp at the Birkenhead Association. The services on Sundays were largely attended, many coming during during the week also. There were several instances of blessing.

The Bishop of Hereford preached in Bristol Cathedral at a special evening service, organized by the Y.M.C.A. Dr. Percival spoke of the hundreds and thousands of young men in the great cities making a federation of Christian workers, and thus witnessing that they were, in their various branches of Christian life, one body in Christ.

Part of the new premises, the first instalment of the fine block of buildings in course of erection on the London Road for the Leicester Association, were opened recently by the Marquis of Northampton, who was supported by Sir H. H. Bemrose, Canon Saunders, and a large number of friends. Lord Northampton said that the Y.M.C.A. constitutes a strong bond of union among all English-speaking Christian young men, a bond which must make for the general welfare of mankind.

The sixteenth annual meeting of the Hackney Association has been held. The chief speakers were Revs. W. Bryant Salmon and W. Pedr Williams. The chairman, in the course of his address, referred sympathetically to the illness of Mr. F. L. Porter, the esteemed secretary. Mr. Oscar Darton quoted extracts from the annual report, which showed that the work is making steady progress.

Since the recent mission of Dr. Harry Guinness at Dublin, followed by a mission to men only, by Rev. T. B. Robertson, of Limerick, under the auspices of the City Y.M.C.A., a work of revival has broken out, and numbers of young men are being led to the Saviour night after night in the Association. The young converts of the mission are bringing their companions to be spoken to, and members of this Association are being used to lead them to the Saviour, a large increase to the membership being the result.

From Mr. Henry Varley.

WRITING from Mount Macedon, Victoria, Australia—3,500ft. above sea level—on November 8, Mr. Henry Varley describes the charms of the mountainous district in which he is resting. "Nestling at all heights and in sheltered positions, commanding lovely views, are mountain cottages and homes where all kinds of English shrubs, plants, trees, and fruits grow, surrounded by deep verandahs, and illustrating in every form the architect's and builder's skill. Several of Victoria's wealthy men have large and beautiful houses in these mountain ranges."

Some of our readers may recall the fact that about ten years ago, Mrs. Varley and Mrs. Sargeant commenced a Home for Consumptives at Echuca. Marked success has attended this much-needed work, about 700 patients having been dealt with. "We have now a Macedon branch of the Institution. To this bracing resort the patients come about the end of November, and the benefit derived is already great. I have been seeking how I could further aid this Institution, and as it has never been mine to seek money aid through your columns, may I say how much I should value assistance in this work? Our Institution, it should be remembered, takes in many from dear old England who have consumption in its early stages.

"After three months of very gracious work in Melbourne, preaching and teaching Christ, the way opens, and the time is at hand for our return to England. I cannot but hope that the New Year's campaign in London and the provinces will prove eminently successful, and I long to have some share in the glorious work of bringing the Gospel of Christ before our fellow-countrymen. It seems to me that London and England need a distinct, careful, and loving re-affirmation of the full-orbed and varied truths of the old Evangelical platform. Oh that every man of God who shall take part in this magnificent work may be anointed with the Holy Ghost, and filled with Divine power! We continue in fervent prayer for this work. I seek with deep anxiety the help of many who believe in prayer. We purpose coming to England by way of San Francisco, leaving Sydney by R.M.S. Alameda December 4, and reaching California the day before Christmas. We shall call at Northfield, and as it will be winter, my beloved wife may possibly stay a little season. I expect to reach London about January 15."

Notices.

A correspondent would like to know where a hymn may be found with the verse:—

A saint! Oh, would that I could claim
The privileged, the honoured name,
And confidently take my stand,
Though lowest of the saintly band.

Smyrna Rest.—Travellers (especially ladies) and sailors still find here "a real haven of rest" when on shore. Visits are so short that much of "the bread" is "cast upon the waters;" but Miss Hamilton's report is brightened by instances of blessed spiritual work, one being that of a Danish engineer, who one week denied the very existence of God, and the next was a rejoicing believer. The Y.W.C.A. continues to be owned of God. Thirty members have been added to the Greek Evangelical Union, in the face of much opposition and persecution.

About Books.

THE PICTORIAL NEW TESTAMENT.

A CHARMING little volume is The Pictorial New Testament; the Authorized Version with Chromographs and Engravings from Drawings made in Bible Lands by H. A. Harper and J. Clark. The character of the work may be gathered from a prefatory Note by the Art Editor, the late Mr. Harper, as follows: "In the illustrations for this volume the artist has not attempted to delineate the Divine Christ. His object has been rather to represent pictorially customs in the East, to which reference is made in the Sacred Word; and by the landscapes to represent Those Holy Fields traversed by the feet of Him who 1,900 years ago was nailed to the cross for the salvation of souls."

The coloured plates in this book are a score in number, and very beautiful. The other pictures—between fifty and sixty in number—are all page size, and of value for the light they throw upon passages of Scriptures with which they are associated. Not only for the young, but for many others, this little book will invest the Sacred Writings with an attractiveness that is as legitimate as it is novel.

This is a publication that is sure to be in extensive demand. It will take noble products of art as well as the inspired writings into the homes of the people. (1s. nett. Office of the Scripture Gift Mission, 15, Strand, W.C.)

DR. BEET ON ROMANS.

THERE is no need to praise Dr. Agar Beet's Commentaries on the Epistles of St. Paul. One after another he has sent them forth, and in steady succession they have earned commendation and passed through several editions. All schools of theology pronounce his works of peculiar value.

Dr. Beet now comes before us as the author of a second commentary on a singularly attractive portion of the New Testament. His work on Romans did much to make his reputation; and in a comparatively short time it passed through eight editions. For some years it has been out of print; and in the meantime Dr. Beet has gone afresh over the entire ground. Hence the volume before us, A Commentary on St. Paul's Epistle to the Romans, is a new work. In the words of the author, "The whole has been re-written, and embodies the writer's mature thought about the greatest work of the greatest of the Apostles of Christ." Dr. Beet claims that his book is a contribution to doctrinal theology and Christian evidences; and it is all this, because the Epistle explained is obviously such.

Every page of this volume affords proof of thorough study of the sacred text, and yields fruit that cannot but help such as would drink of the deep waters of instruction as they flow from Christ through the Apostle's teaching. Dr. Beet discusses every question that fairly arises in the course of the Epistle, and there is never any difficulty in grasping his meaning or ascertaining where he stands. CHRISTMAS NUMBERS.

"Chatterbox" Christmas Box is a capital issue. (1s. Wells Gardner, Darton & Co.) The contents are varied, and amusingly illustrated.

The special issue of Bubbles offers a great treat to the young. There are over thirty coloured pictures, including a plate in sixteen tints. In all its features this is a handsome publication. (With December part, 1s. "Bubbles" Office, 158, Aldersgate Street, E.C.)

The extra Christmas number of the Girls' Own Paper affords much pleasant reading, with artistic plates. The corresponding part of the Boys' Own Paper combines instruction and recreation in welcome proportions. There are large coloured plates. (6d. each. Religious Tract Society.)

The "Sunday Magazine" extra is a complete story—Beatrice Woodward's Perplexities, by Clara N. Carvalho. The "Good Words" extra is a delightful story—How Cynthia Went Amaying. It is a tale of Cromwell's time, and is an admirable combination of adventure and history. (6d. each. Isbister & Co.)

The Quiver signalizes the commencement of the fortieth year of issue with a Christmas number of high tone and literary charm. The list of contributors includes many writers of eminence, and in addition to the wealth of pictorial embellishment there is a fine plate from Mr. Stanhope Forbes' well-known picture, "News at Last." (1s. Cassell.)

The Christmas number of Cassell's Magazine has a variety of attractions, including three Rembrandt photogravures. The presentation plate, suited for framing, is a highly finished photogravure of Mr. George Harcourt's painting, "Good-Bye," depicting the scene at Waterloo Station, twelve months ago, when the Grenadier Guards left London for South Africa. ALMANACKS FOR 1901.

The Church of England Almanack, compiled by Henry Miller, gives valuable details of efforts to meet the modern Romanizing movement. (1d. Shaw & Co.)

The One and All wall-sheet contains portraits of some of the most distinguished workers in connection with the Adult School Movement. Scripture excerpts are given for every day of the year. (Headley Bros.)

Spurgeon's Illustrated Almanack has its familiar features, including articles by the late editor, and Scripture passages selected by Mrs. Spurgeon. John Ploughman's Almanack is a splendid wall-sheet. (1d. each. Passmore & Alabaster.)

Mrs. Murray Mitchell gives us a deeply-interesting peep into the life of Indian girls and women, in her booklet, The True Story of My Life. By A. Doll. (Macniven & Wallace, 138, Princes Street, Edinburgh.)

In From the Front, by J. Kinahan, we have some readable pages from the diary of one of Miss Sandes' Soldiers' Home workers in South Africa during the war. The Lord Primate of Ireland writes a brief introduction. (1s. nett. Marshall Bros.)

The Bible Searching Almanac is a familiar friend. The issue for next year—the eighteenth of the series—has the usual features, and particulars are given of the Bible Searching Union. Copies may be had direct from the Editor, Cotswold, Redhill, post free, 1½d. each, 5 for 6d., 12 for 1s.; ornamental, 1s.; or from J. F. Shaw & Co.

Many who cherish the memory of the late Rev. Charles A. Fox will be glad to possess the booklet just issued by Partridge & Co., containing two characteristic contributions, The Exchanged Will and The Abundant Entrance. The dedication is "in tender farewell to the members of my beloved flock in Eaton Chapel." (1d.)

The Tobacco Curse: With Weighty Reasons why Christians should Abstain from it, is a timely word by Silas Henn. We commended it when first issued, and now welcome it in an enlarged form. Young men, and others in search of a compendium of information on the subject, are advised to study these pages. There is a portrait of the veteran author. (S. Henn, 4, Himley Road, Dudley, Worcestershire.)

General Mercier's proposals for the "Invasion of England," give a special interest to the articles in the November and December numbers of the Leisure Hour on "The Alarm-Bell of the Century," by Mr. William Stevens. The writer tells in stirring words the story of Napoleon's project for invading England, and the response it awakened on this side of the Channel. (6d. Religious Tract Society.)

A singularly useful book for young people is Mrs. E. R. Conder's In the Beginning. The writer has endeavoured to arrange the stories of Genesis that children may read them consecutively for themselves, unhindered by long lists of names. Mrs. Conder expresses the hope that her book will prove worthy of being placed in the hands of little ones when over-tired mothers are too weary to "tell us a story to-day." (3s. 6d. Elliot Stock.)

The volumes of "Confidential Talks," by Dr. Lyman B. Sperry, have commanded warm approval, and exercised an important influence for good. Having addressed young men and women in separate volumes, Dr. Sperry now claims the attention of their elders. His new book is entitled, Confidential Talks with Husband and Wife: A Book of Information and Advice for the Married and the Marriageable. (3s. 6d. Oliphant, Anderson, & Ferrier.) The pages deal, in untechnical language, with subjects of great moment.

The Church Directory and Almanack is a compact and useful book of reference. (2s. nett. Nisbet & Co.) It is an entirely new publication of 640 pages, and more than 14,000 copies were subscribed for before issue. It contains the names of the Archbishops, Bishops and Clergy of the United Kingdom, together with their postal address, their degree, the date of their consecration or ordination, and their present appointments. There is also an alphabetical list of benefices in the United Kingdom. The Almanack section contains—(1) Calendar and Dictionary, with space for memoranda; (2) a set of Pulpit Outlines for the Church's year; (3) a list of Colonial Bishops, with the number of their clergy; (4) accounts of the work of the S.P.G. and C.M.S., and of other missionary organizations, together with lists of missionaries; and (5) reports of Church work amongst soldiers and sailors, together with lists of Army Chaplains and Naval Chaplains; as well as much other information concerning the work of the Church of England at home and abroad.

Notes & Comments

THE Two-Version Bible is proving of great service to Christian workers; and we are glad to say that those who have obtained copies under the scheme set forth in our columns are more than satisfied. How the scheme works may be judged from the following letters:

1. In compliance with your kind offer, I beg to enclose the names and addresses of twelve new subscribers to The Christian, with booksellers' receipts for their subscriptions. I am hoping to receive a copy of the Two-Version Bible.

2. Having been attracted by your offer of a Two-Version Bible to readers who secure twelve more subscribers to The Christian for one year, I set to work; and am glad to be able, with the help of another, to put in my claim. Herewith please find receipts as stipulated.

Owing to the intervention of the Christmas Holidays, and the consequent congestion of work at our printers', we are compelled to go to press very early with the present issue. Particular attention is drawn to the fact that our Donation List includes no gifts received after Thursday afternoon last. Such gifts will be acknowledged in our issue of January 3.

With the New Year we propose to begin a series of articles on the Foundation Truths of the Gospel. Written by teachers well-known for their loyalty to Evangelical doctrine, they may disclose the differences that result from variety of view-point, but they will combine to show the ground and strength of the verities "most surely believed" among Evangelical Christians.

Sad as it is occasionally, there are times when it is a matter of thankfulness to think that the end has come. A long task completed; a trying burden of sorrow lifted; the tyranny of an evil habit finally conquered, a heavy responsibility at last laid down—when the end of these things has come, then the heart beats with a new hope. So the children of Israel must have felt on the morrow of their deliverance, when, gazing back upon the returning waves of the Red Sea, they saw the Egyptians "dead upon the sea-shore." At last deliverance had really come, and there was no more fear of the old foe. It is given to the faithful soul to enter into this glorious experience in the things of the Spirit. To us, too, comes the assurance that some old habits, long resisted, will never more lift their heads, and that some difficult places in the journey to Zion will never recur. Even at the end of a century it is a legitimate source of thankfulness that there have been some forms of suffering, oppression, and evil that lie buried beyond resurrection.

Mr. Goldwin Smith writes a pessimistic paper in the Contemporary Review upon the decay of religion. We think he greatly exaggerates the present positions of criticism and science. For example, it is anything but the fact that criticism, in dealing with the Bible, has destroyed the base of Protestantism—as Mr. Smith alleges. Nor is it at all true that "the evidence of Theism is weakened" by scientific discovery. Still less do we admit that the tendency "of thought" is in the direction of "a universe without guidance or plan, the relation of man to which can never be known."

On the contrary, it is remarkable that in Germany—the home of Rationalism—there is a strong revolt commencing against the materialistic science which has for so long loudly proclaimed its infallibility. Professor Dolbear also clearly shows in his recent work on "Matter, Ether, and Motion," that the latest discoveries of modern science absolutely demand God as the final explanation of the Universe. We agree with Mr. Goldwin Smith that, for the many religion has no real meaning, but this is not due, either to the findings of science or criticism, but to the intellectual and moral indifference which unhappily prevails among our pleasure-sodden people.

At the same time it must be remembered that the Nineteenth Century has been par excellence the century of material things. The science and the art of man have been often exclusively occupied with things that can be measured and weighed. It has been the age of the steam engine and material forces. And undoubtedly an excessive contemplation of such things tends to withdraw the mind from higher claims. Men become like the things they most admire. Added to this, there is human pride which elates men on account of their wonderful discoveries. These two things largely account for the materialism of which Mr. Smith complains. But when "thought" is completed, and the mind turns to the source of all, then materialism becomes impossible. And, thank God, there are many signs that the vain boastfulness of the past is passing away. God has many ways of fulfilling his purposes, and more than once He has allowed men to be sickened with their own ways and their pride, so that at last they may turn to Him.

In the death of Rev. Principal Alfred Cave, D.D., of New College, the Evangelical churches have lost one of their most scholarly and representative leaders. He was a man of wide powers, accurate scholarship, great organizing ability, and untiring industry. Though a broad-minded man, he was intensely Evangelical in his own convictions, and published a work some years ago combating with much learning the theory of composite authorship in the Pentateuch. The same note of simple piety pervaded his preaching and private life. It was the direct outcome of a deep personal experience in early life—an experience which coloured his whole after-character and teaching. The College over which he presided for twenty years, and which he revolutionized in its curriculum and position in the Congregational body owes its departed Principal a priceless debt of gratitude. His sun went down while it was yet day, for Dr. Cave was only fifty-four years of age; but his work will abide.

We have watched with considerable interest Dr. Parker's experiment in editing a London evening newspaper for one week. Mr. Sheldon, it will be remembered, made a similar experiment, but he failed to give news, and so his paper really resolved itself into what one has called "a huge tract." Dr. Parker has not committed this blunder, and his paper has been a real news-paper. In this respect it seems to us to have succeeded. The theatrical advertisements, unfortunately, were retained, but all betting and gambling items were rigorously suppressed. The temporary editor in his first number threw down the gauntlet in saying:—

> If my paper cannot, during six experimental days, live without pandering to the gambler, the drunkard, and the sensualist, then let it wither away. The answer is with Christian men and women.

It is a frightful reflection upon the country's honour if no room can be found for a newspaper—morning or evening—which prints only clean and wholesome matter. Some papers that once were straight in this matter now, alas, pander to the betting fraternity.

The bequests left by the late Mr. Arthington towards the missionary cause have taken away the breath of a great many people. These amount to nearly a million of money, to be mainly applied for the extension of the Gospel among tribes that have not as yet heard of its invitations and warnings. Some of the secular papers seem to feel a certain air of perplexed astonishment that a human being could be found who would deny himself during his lifetime of almost the necessaries of life in order to provide means for spreading the good news of God. The astonishment apparently would not be so great if the money had been left for hospitals, or even for the endowment of a race course. The things of God are ever a foolishness to the world. But they have a way of approving themselves by their results, and no man can forecast the unknown blessings that may flow out of this bequest to countries yet unblessed with the sound of the Gospel.

The interest aroused by Mr. Arthington's action received a temporary check by the report that he had made his money as a brewer. One or two of our contemporaries frankly declared that the Societies were upon their trial in the matter of touching money obtained from such a source. Happily the report is unfounded. Mr. Arthington was the son of a brewer, but for conscience' sake (like Mr. Charrington) he renounced his interests in the business, and started in another direction. His great fortune was honestly made in legitimate business. Two missionary societies alone will benefit to an amount of nearly three quarters of a million sterling. But these bequests are to provide for new undertakings only, they do not help current expenses. So that possibly, as was the case with the Moravian Missions, the boon may bid fair to become a burden. It is imperative therefore that the subscribers to the Baptist and London Missionary Societies should strengthen rather than relax their support, if these bequests are to be of lasting benefit.

The Record, inspired by the way in which the Wesleyan, Congregational, and Baptist Twentieth Century Funds are progressing, asks, with considerable pertinence, why the people of the Established Church should not follow suit, and raise a fund of at least half-a-million? The particular purpose suggested for such a fund is the supplementation of the incomes of poor clergymen, there being, it seems, 1,341 so-called "livings" worth only £65 a year. The most nobly endowed church in the country, comprising the wealthiest classes almost exclusively within its membership, is thus far behind the non-endowed Churches in its power to adequately support its ministers. A more serious reflection upon the system of State endowment and a more significant tribute to the efficiency of voluntaryism could not be desired. We trust that the appeal of The Record will not fall to the ground. "Worthy is the labourer of his meat," and those who preach the Gospel ought to be able to live by it. Here is a noble chance for rich Episcopalians to take a worthy lead.

From nearly every occupant of the Episcopal Bench comes a lament about the dearth of "candidates for Holy Orders." Several of the bishops speak of the situation as being grave. The chief reason alleged for the falling off in the number of candidates is that the Church does not present sufficient "attraction" to young, pushing men. In it they cannot obtain the career which other professions offer—hence they seek it in other callings. If this is, indeed, the real reason, then it is a good thing that applicants are not forthcoming—applicants of this kind. There can be nothing more fatal for any Church than for its ministry to become a mere "profession." The true ministry is a Divine passion, or it is nothing.

We fear, however, that a far graver reason has not been referred to at all, and that is the evident patronage which is accorded to the Romanizers in the Church of England. Unfortunately the Evangelicals are not the most numerous party in the Church of England. If, then, an earnest Evangelical desires to enter the ministry of the Anglican Church, he sees plainly that there are comparatively very few doors open to him—hence he is compelled to remain outside. We are quite safe in predicting that if an Evangelical revival occurred in the Church of England, there would be no dearth of candidates for her ministry.

The London County Council finds itself in a difficulty respecting the thirty liquor licences which have fallen into its hands through the construction of the new Strand to Holborn thoroughfare. The Committee is divided—part of them being in favour of surrendering the whole, at a loss of £90,000, and the other part favouring the transfer of these licences to other parts. The Council is thus called upon to reap the fruits of the stupidities and the loosenesses sown by others in bygone days. For, in the space of 1,000 straight yards, there were no fewer than thirty-four public-houses, which had to be pulled down for the widening of the street. Besides these, there are at the present time nearly 100 licensed houses within a radius of 300 yards of the new thoroughfare. So that practically there were 140 houses licensed within a quarter of an hour's walking distance. Apart from the moral question, it is intolerable that one trade—and such a trade—should have so much respect paid to it. For it means, as in the present case, that when a place has to be pulled down by a corporation, either the privilege is transferred elsewhere, or an excessive sum of money must be paid for what is often a vile business to which the State has given an exaggerated value. And so the taxpayer is compelled to fill the publican's pockets.

Now that the London School Board has begun its duties afresh, and that the danger of the "Religious Question" being revived is practically over, it is gratifying to learn that the standard of efficiency in religious knowledge in the schools of the Board is most creditable. The official report states that—

> It has been a pleasure to read so many papers, all showing such an intelligent knowledge of the lessons learnt from the Bible.

This judgment carries out the opinion of the late Archbishop Benson on the adequacy and even superiority of the Scripture teaching in Board Schools. So long as this is so, the plea of the Sacerdotalists for "denominational teaching" will have nothing substantial to stand upon.

Dr. Miller Maguire, in the National Review, vigorously combats the idea that has become widely current, that our national success is due to the "playing-fields of England's youth." He argues that the passionate addiction of the youth of to-day to field sports largely accounts for the humiliating disasters we have suffered in South Africa during the last year, and suggests that our young officers would have done better if they had played less and studied more in their schooldays. That sports have an educative and disciplinary value is unquestionable; but that they can take the place of honest, hard headwork and industrious study is an absurd fallacy.

A month ago the Pope published a mild and Christian document in which he extolled our Lord as the only Way, the Truth, and the Life. Immediately he follows it with an allocution in which he reasserts his claim to the temporal power:—

> Force has deprived the Pontiff of just and legitimate sovereignty which is closely bound up with the freedom of his ministry. Now, under the power of other men, the Pope is entirely subject to their caprice.

So long as the Pope conducts himself as a respectable citizen he is no more subject to men's caprice than any other member of society. The Italian Government does not interfere with his religious work, whatever it is. Why, then, does he complain? These constant murmurings about the temporal power brood no good to the people. We are living in the light of history, happily. We know what the temporal power meant once upon a time, and if it were recovered, then farewell to liberty. Roma semper eadem est.

Some of the French leading journals have opened a campaign against that increase in intemperance which is giving so much anxiety to those who are interested in the well-being of the people; and in a recent noteworthy article, one of them, quoting from an influential medical man, Dr. Lassabatie, who holds an important office under the Republic, says:—

> France, which in 1885 occupied the seventh place in the nations of Europe as regards the individual consumption of alcohol, has to-day incontestably taken the first place. . . . Alcoholism is to-day, I dare affirm, one of the principal factors in tuberculosis, one of the worst scourges of our epoch, and of our country, and not only is it responsible for a large proportion of the 150,000 deaths in France each year from that disease, but it is also responsible for many other calamities—insanity, suicides, grave crimes of all natures, and a decrease in the population.

The question has already been asked, what will the French Administration do in the face of such an official statement?

While attempts are being constantly made in this country to introduce the Continental Sunday, it is becoming increasingly evident that the Continent is getting tired of it. Even Paris is making rapid strides in the direction of Sunday rest. Scarcely any shops are now open in that city after midday. Mottoes are appearing across the closed shutters of some places of business such as this: "Six jours pour travailler, et le septième pour se reposer"—"Six days for work, and the seventh for rest." Unfortunately, the true motive is not conspicuously prominent in this movement. The love of pleasure and not religion is at the root of it. It is not till the Sunday and the Sabbath are combined in the higher idea of the Lord's Day that we can expect it to be an undivided blessing to any nation. Rest should be pervaded by a devout spirit, or it will not be helpful to the whole man.

The evils of hooliganism are not confined to London, but seem to be breaking out in an exaggerated form in Paris, where the police are very active in their suppression, as many as 3,286 arrests having been made in the slums of that city within a week. Among the weapons found on the arrested were a silk cord for garrotting, a Yankee "knuckle-duster," and the bone of a sheep with a long skewer fixed in a wooden clamp, evidently meant for a diabolical purpose. These revelations of the state of things in the submerged level of society, are such as should give "pause" to those who proclaim the optimist view of social progress, and call for a strenuous effort on the part of all classes to deal courageously with the causes of these dreadful outbreaks. Overcrowding, poverty, the terrible monotony of city life, as well as the loss of personal self-respect under the conditions of life, are some of these causes. Spasmodically only, as yet, does the public mind wake up to these evils; but nothing short of a steady watchfulness, an unwearying humanity, an unbroken determination, will really deal with them successfully.

It appears that in America some of the most inveterate Stock Exchange gamblers are women. In an examination of a bankrupt firm of stockbrokers in New York, this fact came out prominently, and also that some of the less principled brokers take pains to cultivate the speculative spirit among wealthy women. This they do by providing dainty midday luncheons, sandwiched with alluring advertisements, and furnishing sherry free of cost, with the result that they "draw in" and fleece a large number of these trustful women. It is a part of the so-called "emancipation" of women, that they are laid open to fresh temptations of this kind, hitherto outside their pale. A woman-gambler is almost worse than a woman drunkard; both vices are equally ruinous to the nervous system and the spiritual nature.

Some of our colonies are evidently less saturated with Sacerdotalism than the old country, for at the Assembly of the Church of England, held last October at Melbourne, a debate on the Romanization of that Church resulted in the following motion being carried:

> That in the opinion of this Assembly the Romanizing movement in the Church of England is a source of danger to this diocese, and special vigilance is needed to guard against that danger.

An amendment, expressing confidence, that breaches of the law might be dealt with by the bishops directly, according to the provisions of ecclesiastical law, was rejected. If only the laity in this country were to show a spirit of watchfulness and independence similar to that of their brother Churchmen in Australia, we should soon find that short work was being made with priestism at home as well as abroad.

A Century of Progress.

WITHOUT doubt, the Century now closing has been one of progress. There has been political, social, intellectual advance, not merely in Great Britain, but generally throughout Christendom. Of our own beloved land, and of other Protestant countries, much besides may be said, even though we must in every case speak with serious reserve, in view of the various evils, and the many contradictions of Christian profession, that meet the eye and vex the heart. If we may rejoice at progress, it is only "with trembling" at the thought that there have also been such sad advances in the wrong direction —that God-dishonouring refinements of sin have flourished alongside developments of faithful Christian service.

It is with sincere gratitude to God that we momentarily allow our minds to scan the years of the Century, as they stand out in historic record, or live in recent memory. Above everything, from a Christian standpoint, the Century has been one of

MISSIONARY DEVELOPMENT.

Three of the great organizations have quite lately celebrated their centenary—the Baptist, London, and Church Missionary Societies. Others with a like noble purpose have arisen, including the Wesleyan and other Methodist societies; also the Scottish, the China Inland, and other Missions conducted on a smaller scale. Never before was there so extensive and deep an interest in the work of world-wide evangelization, as evidenced by the rapid growth of the Student Movement of our own day, with its inspiring watchword—"The Evangelization of the World in this Generation." The development of missionary activity during the 100 years shows that there have all along been men and women to whom, though unexpressed, the watchword was virtually a principle of Christian service. We would not overlook, under this head, the remarkable work of American, Dutch, French, German, Scandinavian, and Swiss societies—not to mention British Colonial agencies—which have gone far to substantiate a profound and widespread sense of duty in regard to sending the Gospel throughout the earth.

Next comes Home Work, whether in the form of permanent local missions with a varied ministry, or of special efforts to rebuke sin and arouse those who are indifferent to the claims of God. The Century in this aspect has been emphatically one of

EVANGELISTIC ENDEAVOUR.

Never before were there so many men and women preaching the Gospel in its simplicity, and labouring for the good of the people. Our towns and cities have their Mission Halls, and in country districts the colporteur continually goes his round. Lay exhortation is not special to the nineteenth century, nor is open-air preaching, as such, but in both these lines of service there is unquestionably more being done in our day than at any previous time. The list of Gospel preachers who have done great things for God is very long—clergymen and ministers, also plain men of the so-called "laity," such as Brownlow North, Duncan Matheson and D. L. Moody. Moreover, the mouths of our sisters have been opened, and in addition to preaching and teaching they are now engaged in manifold forms of Gospel work.

The century of Wilberforce, Fowell Buxton, Shaftesbury, and Müller has many philanthropic memories; the names of Wichern and Fliedner stand for developments equally marvellous in the practical Christianity of the Fatherland. These have successors on all hands, and "their works do follow them."

Another striking characteristic of the Century is the development of a broad Evangelical spirit, leading to enlarged co-operation among Christian people of various denominations. Hence which is a power in many lands to-day, and deserves more hearty support among ourselves. With this noble organization, which celebrated its jubilee in 1896, we must associate the Week of Universal Prayer, which brings together at the Throne of Grace, each recurring year, thousands of Christian workers who ordinarily see but little of one another. The Alliance has been styled the "Mother of Conferences," and assuredly it has contributed much to bringing these gatherings into the useful prominence which they now enjoy, and above all to give them an interdenominational character. Here we gladly mention Mildmay and Keswick, where Christian men and women meet on a common ground—"All One in Christ Jesus."

The same note of Christian co-operation has appeared in well-known societies—the Y.M.C.A., the aged founder of which is still with us; the Y.W.C.A.; and work among various sections of the community—soldiers, sailors, railway men, &c. In a measure also the great Christian Endeavour movement among young people, has a tendency to promote broad sympathy and affection for "all who love our Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity." The entire succession of agencies on these lines had a grand example set them at the beginning of the century, when the Bible Society came into being, to unite Christians of all names and orders in the great work of disseminating the Word of God. For some years there had been signs and tokens of more cordial co-operation, and the Religious Tract Society had already fairly realised the ideal, and is able to-day to look back upon a completed century of work in the interest of

"OUR COMMON CHRISTIANITY."

These two great societies are among the landmarks of the century.

Christ and his truth should be a uniting force; yet those who bear the Christian name are always dividing. "These things ought not so to be." That was the conviction of the founders of the Evangelical Alliance. And the principles involved are such as THE CHRISTIAN has maintained "these forty years" and more. We thank God for every institution and enterprise which thus stands out as an object-lesson of the heart-warming truth that the flock is greater than the fold.

Time would fail to enumerate the many works which men of God have founded in the course of the Century, and which are the heritage of us "upon whom the ends of the ages have come." We think of Medical Missions and Dispensaries; Deaconesses and Nurses; Ragged Schools, Crèches, Orphanages; institutions to uplift the fallen, and give a chance in life to those who have begun the race against immense odds; endeavours to relieve the distressed or deliver such as suffer persecution. The Nineteenth Century has been full of works of faith in the interest of the weak and wandering; missions to Jews, Mohammedans, and Pagans; also to home heathen; efforts to abolish the evils of strong drink, and reclaim the drunkard; Gospel preaching in season, out of season, with Divine recognition in the form of truly blessed Revivals at various times in different lands.

Of course there is another side to all this. The devil is active, so is the world-spirit, so is Romanism. These do not come under the head of progress, but rather of forms of hindrance.

From time to time unbelief, in the name of progress, has shown itself; it has been named "Rationalism," and has not flourished. Many who expected to derive satisfaction from its fruits have found disappointment and sorrow instead.

If Romanism has not made obvious inroads upon Protestantism, assuredly some of the have gained great and sustained popularity under the form of Ritualism, which has swept over the land with disastrous results, especially during the past generation.

Another form of human wilfulness appears in contempt for the Lord's Day. In the course of the Century, a large literature has accumulated on this subject, scores of prize essays having been published; but still there is much to be desired in the way of due regard for the Day of Rest. While in England and America the hold on the Sabbath has relaxed, in France, where the day had been practically lost to the people, there has arisen a definite endeavour to recover it, with its blessings to the labourer, and its opportunity for religious worship. God grant that the People's Day may soon be more firmly grasped, and its privileges be more highly prized.

Without dwelling upon the social and political blessings of the Century, we cannot but be thankful to God for the continued life and influence of who for an unparalleled period has occupied the throne, with personal dignity and Christian grace. Here we touch one of the signal blessings of the Century, making for the nation's religious welfare as well as its temporal good.

To conclude: When the Century opened, there were many closed doors; now there is the result of the diffusion of education on the one hand, and international comity on the other. Was there ever a time so auspicious for Gospel effort in France, Italy, or Spain? Looking Eastward, we may await with confidence God's time as regards China, but our Indian dependency is certainly "a great door and effectual." The same may be said of many other lands. Therefore we sum up the story of the Century, from a Christian point of view, as emphatically one of Progress, with unexampled Missionary Development at home and abroad, resulting in Doors Wide Open, and Abundant Opportunity to Work for God. May we all obey the Divine Injunction, "Occupy till I Come."

Nothing, Lord!

Luke xxii. 35.

"LACKED ye anything, my followers?"
Jesus asked his love-thrilled band,
"When I sent you forth defenceless,
Poor, and homeless, o'er the land—
Lambs, where wolf-fangs gleamed blood-red?"
"Nothing, Lord," they said.

"Lacked ye anything, beloved,"
Jesus asks us even now,
"When I led you through the desert?
As ye stepped, remember how Fulness seemed so far away?"
"Nothing, Lord," we say.

"Lacked ye anything, beloved,
When, with speech so poor and weak,
As ambassadors I sent you,
Heaven's high interests to seek;
Lacked ye anything that day?"
"Nothing, Lord," we say.

"Lacked ye anything, beloved?
Hath there failed one word of mine—
Anything of loving kindness,
Tender mercy, grace divine;
Any good thing on your way?"
"Nothing, Lord," we say.

WINIFRED A. IVERSON.

On the Watch Tower.

"We spend our years as a tale that is told" (Psa. xc. 6).

By Rev. W. T. TURPIN, M.A.,
Incumbent of Immanuel Church, Eastbourne.

THE shadows of the dying year and century are lengthening upon us, the end is fast approaching, and another milestone in life's journey will soon have been passed. The sunrise and the sunset, both belong to this world; the Eternal Day lies beyond it all, and above it all.

Wherever at this time the eye is turned, instability and change are plainly manifesting themselves; "all the foundations of the earth are out of course." The great moral obligations which in times have bound society and individuals together are in a state of almost collapse. In every department of human life the same sad conviction is forced upon us.

The two great circles on which the eye is most fixed at the present moment are the Church and the World.

In the first, widespread departure from the truth, amounting almost to apostasy from the faith, has well-nigh reached a crisis; so complete and far-reaching has the surrender been, that at times the overwhelming thought seizes one of how little remains to be given up. The accompanying spirit of this growing unbelief is painfully sad and afflicting: pride, arrogance, and haughtiness of mind characterize the determined present-day effort to OVERTHROW THE OLD LANDMARKS OF TRUTH.

In the National Church we are confronted with a designed and determined plot to undo the great work of the Reformation. In order to bring this about, the most solemn vows and promises professed to have been made in the presence of God are flung to the winds, and a type of morality exhibited which would not be tolerated in a respectable earthly business.

In the Nonconformist body, notwithstanding its noble, holy traditions of the past, as well as the long roll of faithful witnesses who adorned its ranks, the gangrene of Down-grade has been doing its sure but deadly work.

Those who seek to stand upon the watch tower and observe the progress of the far-spent night are decried as alarmists, pessimists, and so forth; external appearances, it is said in great triumph, are against them. The great increase of knowledge, the enormous strides of science, the rapid growth of philosophy, the clearer light of a deeper and more enlarged scholarship, are all flung in our faces, as it were, and we are in the presence of such indisputable testimony.

How solemn, then, is it not, as we draw near to the close of the Century and the year, to see superstition and rationalism hand-in-hand, overflowing the face of the land, and carrying a great multitude of people on their flood-tide. In the presence of all this, the words of our Lord come in power to our hearts: "When the Son of Man cometh shall He find the faith on the earth?"

When we turn and look at the condition of the great WORLD around us, how ominous are the signs on the horizon. The lull of the armed peace has already been broken. Who can tell what complications may be at hand, what embroilment of nations may arise out of present struggles? It needs but an open eye to see the dark cloud which overhangs the world. Who can tell how soon it may burst, or what the crash will be?

Thank God, amid all these time marks, and above and beyond all this upheaving, the bright and blissful heavenly hope shines forth in all its own brilliancy and warmth, to cheer and revive the heart of the watcher and waiter for the One who is coming. This heavenly hope is the heart's affectionate longing for Himself to be with Him for his own sake, and to be in his blessed presence and company above and at home for ever. Meanwhile in, and by his grace, the heart that truly loves, and waits for Him, gathers up renewed and fresh courage and energy to occupy for Him until He come. True affection for Christ, and looking for Him, does not sink down into selfish sloth and lethargy, but, on the contrary, gathers up renewed vigour for newly-opened fields of service at home and abroad, hears his own voice with greater distinctness, saying—

"Whom shall I send, and who will go for us?" Humbly, yet in confidence and faith, let us respond, "Here am I, send me."

Elisha, the Prophet of Vision.

IX.—The Lost Axehead.

(2 Kings vi. 1-7).

By Rev. F. S. WEBSTER, M.A.*

THIS story is a stumbling-block to rationalists. The miracle seems to them childish. They cannot explain it away, and they do not like to accept it. The Christian, however, does not sit in judgment upon God's Word. It is unreasonable to believe in God and object to miracles. Nor are we fit judges as to what is or is not a sufficient cause for God to interfere, as men call it, with his own laws. We approach the story, then, not to criticize or explain away Holy Scripture, but to learn more of God's faithfulness and thoughtful care.

The prophet's college was over-full. There was no room for the growing number of students. This was very encouraging. There had been no such difficulty in Elijah's day. But Elisha had reaped where Elijah had sown. The ploughing time of judgment had been followed by a Pentecostal harvest. The blessing brought increased responsibility. It always is so. The reward of work is more work. There can be no standing still or

RESTING ON OUR OARS.

The command is always "Spare not. Stretch forth." We must be ever pressing forward, both in the pursuit of personal holiness and in our efforts to win men for God.

So they wish to build. They go about it wisely. They ask advice; they are plain and simple in their ideas. They are all willing to help; they invite Elisha to accompany them.

Well, we are all builders. The building of character is going on continually, and our influence day by day is either helping or hindering the building of God's Church on earth. A good foundation and the right material are both necessary for successful building. Alas for us if our hopes rest on anything save the Word of God, which liveth and abideth for ever. Except the Lord build the house, they labour in vain that build it. There is much vain labour in so-called Christian work. Much work, which will be burned up when the day of reckoning comes. The great secret is to work in the Master's presence, looking for his return. This will keep the motive right, and give all needed patience and diligence and courage. It is a great testimony to Elisha that these young fellows felt that his consent to their plans was not enough; they needed his presence too. "Be content, go with thy servants," must be our word to the Master in all our work for Him. But in spite of Elisha's presence arose. Standing on a tree overhanging the river, one of the young men laboured more vigorously than wisely, and the axehead flew off and fell into the water. It was a small matter, but it caused him real distress. "Alas, master," he cried, "for it was borrowed." He was an honest fellow, you see. He might have said, "What a stupid, worthless tool, the owner deserves to lose it." Or, "It's an accident, and not my fault; a good thing it isn't mine, I needn't trouble about it." Perhaps he felt that damage would be done to God's cause if the loss was not made good, and axeheads were not so easily obtained in those days.

We are not to let our good be evil spoken of. Dishonour may often accrue to God's cause if we are careless about what is due to others. We are always borrowing kindnesses and social attention from our neighbours. We ought to try and return them, not as a matter of burden to society, but for the glory of God.

Elisha saw it would be for God's glory that the axe should be restored. So he cut down a stick and threw it into the water, like a chief's bâton; the act implies a command to the elements from One whom they must obey. At once "by a secret clause in the law of gravity," the iron rose from the depths of the stream and moved towards the shore, where he could reach out and take it. Let the rationalist reason as he pleases; one hypothesis, perhaps, will insert a gigantic wooden handle large enough to float the heavy iron, another will reduce the iron mass into a thin and airy plate which can be swept up by the rushing current. We leave the how to God, who alone knows. It is enough for us that the same power which raised Jesus from the dead, raised that sunken iron to the surface of the stream. We are glad to find that nothing is sunk too low for God to raise it.

You say, does God care for trifles like this? Yes, certainly, when they affect our happiness and his glory.

THERE ARE NO TRIFLES

in the lives of God's children. The smallest circumstances, the losing of a purse, the mislaying of a book or letter, the missing of a train, all may serve God's purpose and show forth his glory.

But what a beautiful lesson the story teaches. We are workers for God. We work with borrowed power. This power may be lost, not only from indolence and neglect, but even through over-energy in God's work. God's carpenters sometimes show more strength than skill. They do the right thing in the wrong way. The energy of the flesh, or the wisdom of the flesh, leaves no room for God to work, and the power is lost. See then how the lost power was regained.

(a) The man stopped working. Of course, you say, how could he cut down trees when the axe-head was gone. I fear Christian workers are not so wise. They think to make up by their own earnestness for the lack of Divine power. They use the handle of human learning or ecclesiastical status, although the cutting, driving power of God has left them.

(b) He told Elisha at once. That's the first thing to do. Go and tell Jesus. It was a public confession in this case, and sometimes it is well for ministers and workers to confess publicly that they have LOST THE POWER THEY HAD.

Generally, however, it is enough to tell Jesus. You do not need to tell others; they see it for themselves.

(c) He showed Elisha the place where it fell. It is always well to be definite with your Lord. Show Him the place. Were you puffed up over that success? Did you distrust over that trouble? Were you contaminated and defiled by that company? Think whether it was that new interest, that book, that game, that study, that robbed you of your secret time with God?

(d) Elisha at once brought it within reach. Interpret the casting of the wood as you like. There is one thing that always brings lost blessing within reach. It is the Cross of Calvary. The precious blood of the dear dying Lamb has brought within the reach of faith every blessing that we need. Bring the Cross to bear upon your lost peace and power, and at once it is within your reach.

(e) The man "put out his hand and took it." He did it at the bidding of Elisha. Do then, I pray you, the same, even at the bidding of Jesus, who still says to all his disciples, "Receive ye the Holy Ghost!"

Moslem Women in Tunis.—Mrs. Arthur V. Liley writes from Tunis that, with strength renewed, she is now able to take some part in the work among Moslem women, some whom she has visited listening attentively, and assuring her that they quite understood and loved to hear about Jesus. Mr. Liley adds that a book-shop for the sale of the Scriptures has been opened in a much frequented street in an Arab quarter. A roll of texts has attracted passers by, a number of whom, on invitation, have come inside to examine the books, and have entered into long and interesting conversations respecting the Gospel.

Day by Day.

SUNDAY, December 30. Lamentations i.

THIS book is remarkable for its great variety of touching images and plaintive laments, all expressing the deepest sorrow. The prophet seems to be passing to-and-fro amid the ruins of the city and temple, burned with fire, strewn with the bodies of the slaughtered soldiers and people. He sets himself to turn the people in penitence and faith to the God of their fathers, whose commands they had so deeply disobeyed.

The widowed city is depicted as weeping sore, her cheeks covered with tears, deserted by her former lovers, and overtaken in the narrow mountain passes by her foes. The very roads cry out for the pilgrim feet which no longer traverse them. The departure of her beauty, the sad memory of happier days, the shamelessness of the people's sin, the violation of the holy place by Gentile feet, the extremity of famine, the unutterableness of her sorrow, the twisted yoke of her sins, the treading of her fruit as in the wine press beneath the feet of Him who desired to be her Lover and Saviour—all these are depicted in graphic colours. And, finally, the city herself (vv. 18, &c.) is introduced, lifting up her voice in the bitterest grief, and crying in the ear of God.

It is always sad to stand amid the emblems of decay, whether it be the fading leaves of the forest amid the drenching rains of autumn, or the mouldering gothic arch, or the city desolate and forsaken. But there is nothing in all these to be compared to the ruin of the soul, in which God was once worshipped, and his praise celebrated, through which the feet of holy thoughts trod, and in which love and faith and reverence, white-stoled in their purity, ministered before the shrine. For such a soul to be filled with hideous and unclean thoughts is pitiable indeed, and may well extort elegies more pathetic than these of Jeremiah. There is need to ask that God would restore thy soul and mine. "He restoreth my soul."

MONDAY, December 31. Lamentations ii.

Notice how the desolation of Jerusalem is attributed to the Lord Himself. The Lord covered her with a cloud; the Lord swallowed up the habitations of Jacob; He hath cut off; He hath bent his bow; the Lord was her enemy, &c. Let us look beyond the immediate cause of our chastisement to Him, who deals with us as a father with his children. Remember, there is no chance of respite until there is repentance, nor of relief until there is return.

This is the last day of the century, and of the year. It is full of solemn memory. We cannot but review the way by which we have come, and not we alone, but the Church of Christ, and the land we love. There have been many mercies for which we praise God, but the year goes out 'mid blood and tears. Ah, the many homesteads which are desolate, and the lives which are widowed through the terrible massacres of China, and the not less terrible strife in South Africa. What is the lesson in all this? Have we applied our heart to it?

And now the New Century is breaking. On every hand the signs, which our Lord and the Apostles gave, of the close of the era, accost us. It cannot be long before we hear the midnight cry. Let us trim our lamps. Verse 19 is marvellously appropriate for watchnight.

TUESDAY, January 1. Lamentations iii.

Speaking for himself, the prophet personifies his people. His description of the miseries through which they were passing is very pitiful—the wrinkled skin, the broken bones, the darkness as of the grave, the lofty walls that encompassed them, the penetration of the sharp arrows into their flesh, the derision of the people, the grit of the coarse flour that broke his teeth, the wormwood and the gall of his cup.

Full suddenly he draws out another stop in the organ, a stream of hope and comfort pours upon the ear. It is as though he had caught the cadence of some angel minstrelsy. His heart forgets its grief, as he dwells on the Lord's mercies and unfailing compassions. Every morning of those dark days witnessed some new provision of God's care. Forlorn as might be his lot, he could still reckon upon the faithfulness of his never-failing Friend. And the conclusion of his soul amid all his trouble was that God was good. Hold to that, soul, in spite of all appearances, and as this New Year's morning breaks, dare to believe that the Lord is good. Say it to thyself a thousand times. He will not cast off. Though He may have caused grief, yet is his compassion in proportion to the multitude of his mercies.

As our confessions and petitions ascend to God, as we search and try our ways, and turn again to Him, we shall become conscious that He is drawing near (v. 57). "Thou saidst, Fear not." How often God will utter those words as the years pass! When dreaded evils assail and threaten to overwhelm, as the waves the barque on the Lake of Galilee, that voice, mightier than the noise of many waters, will reassure, and, finally, as we pass into the gate of eternity, our first utterance will be, "O Lord, Thou hast pleaded the causes of my soul; Thou hast redeemed my life" (v. 58).

WEDNESDAY, January 2. Lamentations iv.

This fourth elegy tells us of the agony of the siege. Gold and silver vessels of the sanctuary have lost their sanctity, and lie strewn unheeded in the streets, and the priests that bear them fare no better. If they were once comparable to fine gold, they were now esteemed as earthen vessels, common and brittle. The miseries of the children and of young girls reared in scarlet; the degradation of nobles who had taken such infinite pride in the beauty of their person (v. 7); the cruel hunger of mothers (v. 10); the retribution on prophet and priest (v. 13), pass in vivid succession before our gaze. We can never forget that it is thus that God punishes sin. He may bear with us through long years, but his mills at last grind to powder.

From v. 15, the prophet describes the horror with which even heathen peoples should regard the chosen of the Lord, chasing them from their lands and homes as though they were lepers. In following verses the prophet tenderly laments the death of the king! From far and near, the prophet selects the most sombre hues, to lend darkness that may be felt to his picture.

Let us, too, dwell under the shadow of our Lord. He can never fail us, but will ever spread his tabernacle over his beloved. We may say, therefore, "The Lord, He is our refuge and fortress, our God in whom we trust." Dwelling in Him, we find our home in every clime; missing Him, we are lonely indeed, though we may be dwelling in our home, surrounded by our dearest.

THURSDAY, January 3. Lamentations v.

Remember, O Lord! But it is not possible that God should forget. Throughout the wide universe his Spirit broods, sensitive to the least cry—of the bird struck by its pursuer in the woods, or the fear of the tiny fish darting before the shark. There is not a ripple that breaks in foam on mid-Atlantic or Pacific, not a nut falling to the ground in the tropical jungle, not a flower loosening its petals on the lawn, not a tear falling from the smallest child, torn from its mother in some obscure village of the Soudan, which is not felt by God throughout his mighty Nature.

What Zion was of old, the Church of Jesus Christ is to-day, and there are many points in this description of the desolated city which are applicable to the condition of the Church. It is very serious. The masses of our people are certainly abstaining to a larger extent than ever from church attendance, whilst the very Sunday schools show a perceptible ebb. One half of the visible Church is rent with strife about ritual, and the other half about doctrine. May we not claim that God should remember what is come upon us, consider, and behold our reproach?

What a comfort it is to remember that He remains for ever, that his throne is unaltered amid the changes that pass over human generations! Let us ask Him to turn the vast populations of our land to Himself, and to renew our days as of old, giving back to us what we have so heedlessly flung away. May it not be a matter of very special prayer, by all branches of the visible Church, that the great Simultaneous Mission of the Free Churches may be the beginning of revival; and during the All Day of Prayer on January 21, when the Queen's Hall will be filled from 11 a.m. till 10 p.m. with praying crowds, let the cry throughout the church be, Renew our days, as of old.

FRIDAY, January 4. Ezekiel i.

Ezekiel's name means God will Strengthen, or prevail. Like Jeremiah, he was a priest as well as a prophet. He lived among those Jews who were carried away captive by Nebuchadnezzar, and settled on the river Chebar, the northern part of Mesopotamia. He began to prophesy about six years before Jerusalem was destroyed; he was therefore contemporary with Jeremiah, and prophesied partly before and partly after the destruction of Jerusalem.

It would seem as though a dark storm-cloud approached him, from which an incessant blaze of lightning revealed itself. As it drew nearer, the prophet beheld the form of the four living creatures, each having a wheel beside him, symbolic of the round of divine providence, ever revolving in perfect circles. The living creatures or cherubim supported a blue expanse on which God was enthroned in human form. The whole conception impresses the mind with a sense of the reality, greatness, and power of the Divine providence and majesty.

The description of the cherubim may arrest us for a little; they combine, under various figures, intelligence, strength, patience, and soaring aspiration. Their bodies veiled with their wings in token of humility; their method of advance, straight forward, because they knew no vacillation or hesitation in doing God's will; their obedience, prompt and immediate, whithersoever the divine impulse moved them. What glorious beings were these! How marvellous the perfect sympathy between themselves and the wheels of providence! It seems as though they represent the sentient creation, while the wheels stand for the material, both in perfect correspondence with the will of God. Angels and Nature will serve us, if we too are in union with God.

SATURDAY, January 5. Ezekiel ii.

This chapter tells how his commission came to the prophet. Let every minister of Jesus Christ ponder these words. That people are impudent and stiff-hearted; their words, briers and thorns; and themselves as scorpions, should make no difference. Our commission is to address them in the name of God, whether they will hear or forbear.

Notice the solemnity of the prophet's address. It began with, Thus saith the Lord God (v. 4). Let us never speak without the assurance that God speaks in and by us, and that it is not our word, but his. Let us wait before God till we hear Him speak, and then utter his words in living echoes of his voice. There lies the fault in much of the preaching of the present day. Men write essays about God, rather than speak the words of God; they argue about Him, rather than witness to Him. The voice of the prophet has almost ceased amongst us, and missing this, preachers forfeit their supreme authority in the realm of conscience, and miss its still small voice corroborating their utterance. We can never say, "Thus saith the Lord," to the ear but that conscience cries, "Thus saith the Lord," in the heart.

But for all this we need strength. No man can stand against the continual opposition of his fellows, or the temptation of the devil, unless his strength is renewed, as the prophet's in vision, by eating that which God gives. "I found thy words and did eat them," must be a sentence often on our lips. Why should not this New Century be pre-eminently one for private Bible study? Let us not be content with anything less than full meals of Bible truth. This will make us impregnable before the assaults of God's enemies and ours, and give grit and stamina to our words.

Poems for the Season.

On the Threshold.

Before the common round of care
Its virgin hours engage,
Before a single entry lie
Upon its snowy page—
Bring the New Year, that God may write
His own sweet message there,
Thus every record, dark or bright,
His autograph shall bear.

The New Century.

"Behold, the nations are as a drop of a bucket, and are counted as the small dust of the balance: behold, He taketh up the isles as a very little thing" (Isa. xl. 15).

Alleluia! He cometh! the Century's Lord!
With the dew of his youth as the prophets record;
In his hand is the Sword of the Spirit divine,
And that sword He is placing in thy hand and mine.

As a giant equipped with the armour of light,
Thou mayst conquer thy foes through the power of his might;
For the powers of the darkness are quenched by the shield
Which is worn by the stalwarts who know Christ revealed.

Though the darkness may cover the face of the earth
With the terrors of war, and the horrors of dearth,
There's a light in the darkness, a hush in the strife,
To the friends of King Jesus, who share in his life.

Though the Century closes in war-clouds and gloom,
The New Age emerges from out of its tomb,
With its hands in the Hand of the Lord of the earth,
Whilst joy-bells are ringing to welcome its birth!

An Old Year's Memory.

"They shall abundantly utter the memory of thy great goodness" (Psa. cxlv. 7).

The year has gone with all its days
Of toil, and tread of beaten ways:
Its dreads have all been faced; and still
Its happy things our memories thrill.

But clearer far than aught besides
One blessèd memory abides—
A consciousness our hearts have known
That Jesus ruleth from the throne.

His goodness went before, and planned
Our way; then took us by the hand
And led on softly, till we said
"God's will is sweet"!—heart-comforted.

His goodness oft and oft forgave,
O'er-ruled mistakes and made us crave
From evil to be separate—
"His gentleness shall make us great."

Oh! for an utterance of praise,
To Him who crowns our earthly days!
Abundant utterance in deed,
As well as word—God's best-loved meed.

"Hope Thou in God."

(Psa. xlii. 11.)

"Now the God of Hope fill you with all joy and peace in believing, that ye may abound in Hope, thro' the power of the Holy Ghost" (Rom. xv. 13).

Within my heart there lives an Angel fair—
Her name is Hope, her sisters, Faith and Love!
And when the mist of tears obscures the land;
And Faith has lost her trust and cannot stand;
And Love grows cold, and will not "kiss the rod";
She sings this heaven-born cadence on the air.
"Hope thou in God!"

She sitteth singing in my heart,
This sweet harmonious song,
"Hope thou in God"! and all the day
It riseth clear and strong!
Great grandchild of my deepest griefs,*
She smiles thro' every sorrow;
And whispers thro' each sleepless night,
"The Sun will rise to-morrow!"

I sit and nurse my care. It grows
A cold dark shade 'twixt me and Praise!
'Till Hope the door wide open throws,
And floods my heart with sunlit rays!
The "God of Hope," who changes not,
Speaks peace, and love, and joy, and strength;
Divinest Anchor of my soul,
Within the veil I rest at length!

Cast down? Disquieted? alas!
Hast thou forgotten all his love?!
Has He forgotten thee? ah! No!
How could the Faithful faithless prove?
Why then despond? Look up and smile,
And thank for countless mercies given.
"Hope thou in God," earth's little while!
Each dawn, each day, leads up to Heaven!

The Call of the Silver Trumpet.

(Thoughts suggested by the dawn of the Twentieth Century.)

"Gather my saints together unto Me" (Psa. l. 5).
"When the congregation is to be gathered together, ye shall blow, but ye shall not sound an alarm" (Num. x. 7).

Six thousand years! they have nearly gone,
As the seasons speed, and the months roll on.
And each year as it flies has a tale of its own
To unfold in the light of God's awful Throne.

O record of suffering! O torrent of tears!
O hearts that have bled through the weary years!
Like the gathering mists at the close of day
Each adds to the sun ere it hastes away.

The sin-stained earth is red with the slain—
Not bodies alone, but the souls of men.
And the hosts of evil encompass their prey
And drag it far from the light of day.

God's angels look down with sorrowful eyes
As the sighs and groans of the saints arise;
And, as they listen, they hush their song,
While the agonized cry goes up—"How long?"

"Not long, not long, O my yearning Bride"
(Thus his heart responds who for her has died)
"Never darker the night, never nearer the day,
Yet listen, and watch—I am on my way!"

Hush! a silence broods—Oh, what meaneth this?
What strange sweet thrill of expectant bliss
That steals o'er the heart of the waiting saint
With rapture that nigh makes the spirit faint?

'Tis the Bridegroom's kiss as He calls his own,
Ere He steps from his glorious sapphire throne;
While the silver trumpet peals through the air,
The Church's summons to meet Him there!

The silver trumpet! Redemption sound!
Whose thrill thro' the earth's remotest bound
Shall awake the sleeping, the living transform,
To resemble their Lord on that wondrous morn.

Could there be such a thing as a thought of fear
On that day for any whom He holds dear?
There shall "sound no alarm," and no fear can stay;
One look in his face, and 'twill vanish away!

Six thousand years! Oh, how close we stand
To the gate of our own, our fatherland,
And we catch faint sounds of its music rare,
And a ravishing glimpse of its Prince so fair.

The moment is near! Let us watch and pray,
For the Bridegroom cometh at break of day,
And the Bride looks up through her falling tears
For the dawn that follows six thousand years!

Theatrical Employees.—Mr. William Forbes writes:—"Orange Street Hall, Leicester Square, was crowded with theatrical women at our recent tea and meeting. Mr. Spencer Johnson spoke and sang. Christmas cards and 'flower texts' were given to each guest." As a large number of theatrical women are engaged for provincial pantomimes, Mr. Forbes will be glad to hear from Christian friends who may be willing to take an interest in these people. Mr. Forbes also desires to hear of suitable employment for a young man and his wife who have given up the theatrical profession. The man speaks French and German. The Power of Prayer.

WHO can express the powerful oratory of a believer's prayer? This little word, Father, lisped forth in prayer by a child of God, exceeds the eloquence of Demosthenes, Cicero, and all the most renowned orators in the world. We knock at heaven, and the heart of God flies open. Gurnall.

The Distress of Unbelief.

You can inflict no severer penalty on the unbeliever than to leave him alone in the quiet possession of his unbelief. He labours to persuade himself that he is "like the beasts that perish." But if no one disturbs him in his fool's inheritance, he will disturb himself. He may laugh at the faith of others, but his own blank makes no laughter for himself, when alone with himself. Dr. John Pulsford.

I. It is to take place in regard to all the members of the Church. (1) Who are these members? All who have been gathered to Christ from the world ("the sea") by the Word ("the net") (47). (2) Why in regard to all? Because they are different: "which gathered of every kind" (47).

II. When it is to take place: (1) When the gathering of the members is finished. "But when it was full" (48). (2) On the day when all things shall be manifested, "they drew to shore" (48).

III. The manner in which it is to be done. (1) It shall be exact: "all the good" and "all the bad" shall be severed from each other (48). (2) It shall be decisive (50). Lisco.

The Lord's Supper.

The Lord's Table.—What precious memories, soul-entrancing views of the Lord, humbling disclosures of self and sin, rapturous revellings in his love, and seasons of truest worship!

I. Its Place.—The gathering point of the Church of Christ "until He come." The centre of Christian fellowship, and of the ministry of the Word.

II. Its Design.—A perpetual object-lesson in the truth of Calvary. Emphasises his intended personal return (Hebrews x. 37).

III. Its Significance.—(1) A memory—of a Work, but beyond that of a Person. (2) An anticipation—the Lord's Death, his Table, and his Coming are the Church's threefold heritage during his absence; and the days of her humiliation "till He come." (3) Communion—sharing with others: "drink ye all of it."

We go to the Table as guests, not as hosts. Note community of life between Christ and the believer. (See 1 Cor. xii.; Eph. iv.; Gal. ii 20; etc.)

Our life is a participation in his life, and is dependent on Him. There is a present fellowship of the body and blood of Christ (1 Cor. x. 16).

Our observance of the ordinance—(1) Declares our grateful love and loyalty to Christ. (2) Provides for our growth in the Divine life. (3) Witnesses to both Calvary and Olivet. (4) Manifests the unity of the mystical body of Christ. W. A. Southwell.

"Million Pledges" Crusade.

INTERVIEW WITH MR. JAMES T. SEARS.

ABSTAINERS in the Free Churches are displaying commendable energy in the organization of a Twentieth Century "Million Pledges" Crusade. With the object of eliciting information as to the position and prospects of the movement, a member of our staff recently interviewed Mr. James T. Sears, J.P., secretary of the Baptist Total Abstinence Association, to which body is due the initiation of the Crusade.

"I understand, Mr. Sears," said our representative, "that the Free Churches are taking up the Crusade unitedly?"

"That is so. So long ago as April, 1899, the idea of a great Twentieth Century temperance effort was suggested at the annual meeting of our Association by the chairman, Alderman White, of Norwich. Our Executive adopted the proposal, and, as it seemed to us that the proposal was one which would commend itself to the other denominations, we communicated with their respective temperance organizations. The result was a verdict of emphatic approval, and it was resolved to make common cause in securing a million pledges."

"What steps are being taken to influence the country and arouse public interest?"

"An Executive Committee has been formed, comprising

REPRESENTATIVE MINISTERS AND LAYMEN

from each denomination. The general secretaries are Revs. G. Armstrong Bennetts (Wesleyan Methodist) and J. Thornley, of Sheffield (Free Methodist), while the treasurer is Mr. R. H. Penney, J.P., of Brighton, a well-known member of the Society of Friends. In practical effort, the Committee is displaying enthusiasm and wisdom in endeavouring to awaken the country to a sense both of the need and the opportunity."

"And your methods of procedure are——?"

"Many. First we have issued a plan of crusade. The guiding principle is that the denominational temperance associations shall secure the co-operation of their churches. Then in each town or district united councils shall be formed, consisting of all the abstaining Free Church ministers, and a lay representative from each congregation. In each church, too, there is to be a correspondent who will keep in touch with the central executive."

"Have the leading ministers taken action?"

"Yes, vigorously. An appeal has been issued to the Free Churches, signed by such representative men as Revs. Dr. Clifford, Dr. Monro Gibson, Hugh Price Hughes, Dr. Mackennal, Dr. Maclaren, Thos. Spurgeon, Dr. Stephenson, J. S. Balmer, William Goodman, F. W. Bourne, and Mr. John Hilton. Here is a quotation:—

"We are confident that against the cruel drink evil, and enter as earnestly into the Gospel Temperance Crusade as they did into the Seven-Day Newspaper agitation, the opening of the Twentieth Century will see a marvellous change of public opinion, which will not only powerfully influence the members of our Legislature, but bring untold blessing to the home life of the people, and greatly extend the kingdom of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ."

"Have your manifestoes been well received?"

"I am pleased to say that we have received encouraging responses from all parts of the country. As one way of stimulating interest, we have issued the first number of a bright monthly magazine, 'The Crusader.' It contains 'ammunition' for workers in the form of notes of advance, medical and other opinions on the use of alcohol, and stirring appeals from well-known leaders. Here is a quotation from Rev. F. B. Meyer: 'Sign the pledge; it is a protest against strong drink. You must take a side. Neutrality in this war is impossible; to sit on the fence despicable. To partake of strong drink is to range yourself on the side of the greatest foe of the Gospel, and of human happiness. Come out and be separate, and touch not the unclean thing.'"

"What action will be taken to secure the pledges?"

"At the United Gospel Temperance Missions, which are to be arranged in every town, the pledge will be, of course, a chief feature. We have already issued, too, a neat pledge form, of attractive appearance, bearing the passages: 'I can do all things through Christ, which strengtheneth me;' and 'Christ pleased not Himself.' The counterfoil, containing the name and address of the signator, is preserved by the worker, who retains it as a record. Some pointed reasons for signing are set forth on the form. For example:

Because the general adoption of total abstinence would entirely remove the national disgrace of intemperance and its accompanying evils.

Because science declares that alcohol injures the body.

Because Total Abstinence is safest for the individual. Every year a large number who overstep the line of 'moderation'

BECOME HABITUAL DRUNKARDS.

Because the home circle will be safer. For the sake of the children, parents should set a safe example.

Because the example of personal abstinence is the most effective means of winning the intemperate to paths of virtue and sobriety.

Because to deny ourselves for the sake of others is a Christlike act, which will be rich in blessing to ourselves and others."

"Do you not think, Mr. Sears, that, admirable as these arrangements are, they may yet fail to touch those great bodies of people who, unhappily, are outside the radius of church influence?

"We have made provision for the difficulty. So far as can be arranged by the local councils, a systematic house-to-house canvass will be made, with a distribution of literature. The workers will also be provided with neat little books containing twelve pledge forms, with counterfoils, convenient for carrying in the pocket. In the course of visitation and personal dealing, these books promise to be very useful. The demand for them is so great that we have already disposed of 25,000, and more are being printed."

"Have the district committees arranged any important missions?"

"Yes, a large number. Some of the great provincial cities are manifesting an excellent spirit in the matter, and prominent workers are coming forward to assist. Special meetings are being arranged for men and for women, while various sections of the community wil also be dealt with separately. Among othe, ventures, a circular is being issued to trades men, setting forth the advantages of abstinence from a material as well as a spiritual point of view. Let me add, as showing the spirit in which the work is being taken up, that at several places the councils have undertaken to raise a definite number of pledges. Liverpool guarantees 20,000, Kettering 1,000, and such welcome communications are coming in in good numbers. The Executive are sparing no effort, and by God's blessing we anticipate a splendid temperance advance as the outcome of the Million Pledges Crusade."

THE INAUGURAL MEETING.

The inaugural meeting of the Crusade in London was held recently at the Metropolitan Tabernacle.

After Pastor THOMAS SPURGEON, who presided, had spoken in high terms of the movement, Miss DOCWRA (Society of Friends) said that we are opening the new century with two great movements, the Simultaneous Mission and this Crusade. Judgment must begin at the house of God, and the members of the Christian Church must weigh their responsibility for the intemperance of our land. When there are public-houses called where women sit and drink for hours in succession, it is time to be up and doing. Much is made of the fact that in London 109 persons lost their lives by fire in a year, but that number die from alcoholic indulgence in seventeen hours and twenty-three minutes.

"WOMEN'S PUBLIC-HOUSES,"

1769

Rev. J. E. Wakerley (London Central Wesleyan Mission), who followed, said that, as a member of a Board of Guardians, he found that 75 per cent. of the poor-house inmates have come to their unhappy position as a result of strong drink.

After encouraging words from Alderman White, M.P., and Rev. H. Elvet Lewis, Dr. Monro Gibson, representing the Presbyterian body, said that the present is the great time of stock-taking for the nineteenth century, which has been a marvellous century for material progress and intellectual development. Had the material and intellectual been enough, we should now have been in the golden age. But is life so much nobler and better? Is it happier than one hundred years ago? Two things are wrong, selfishness and unbelief, and what the world needs is regeneration. After all the triumphs of our temperance work, intemperance is worse than ever. In 1840 the colossal drink bill was nearly £3 a head. In 1896 it was nearly £4. We groan under the burden coming on us from the war; yet every year we spend a far larger sum in strong drink. The increase of in the past twenty years is for males forty-three per cent., and for females 104 per cent. Pledge-taking is not a violation of liberty, but an acknowledgment of it. God asks it for the sake of our brothers and sisters of the human family, and if the churches do their part in the power of the Gospel, the twentieth century will show as great advance in the moral and spiritual as did the nineteenth in the material and intellectual.

Further particulars, with samples of the literature prepared, including pledge forms and magazines, may be obtained from Mr. J. T. Sears, Crane Court, Fleet Street, E.C.

Christian Endeavour.

TOPIC FOR DECEMBER 30.

The Old and New—Four Purposes (Matt. xiii. 51, 52; Luke v. 36-39).

THE Old and New meet together on these the last days of the century. We resemble those of whom the apostle said that the ends of the ages have come upon them, the close of one and the beginning of the other. The great question for us to be sure of is, that we have been made disciples to the kingdom of Heaven, for the disciple becomes as a householder. Memory is like a store-house, filled with the garnered experiences of the past: and faith and hope are like the stalwart sons of the householder, who are ever going forth to sink mines, plough fields, and explore the treasuries of nature, that they may bring forth thence new treasure to enrich. The young soul who belongs to Christ has perhaps a sorrowful sense of ignorance and inexperience, but let such take heart, for the Bible is itself a store-house filled with treasure. What we have not yet learnt in our experience is stored there from the experience of the wisest and holiest of the world, taught and inspired by the Divine Spirit. We need to learn where the treasures are deposited, on what shelves, and in what compartments, so that we may easily avail ourselves of them at any given moments. To know what the Bible contains, and how to find what we need, may well be the work of a life-time, ever growing richer as we learn to realize the unsearchable riches of Christ. The oldest student of the Bible is always returning to it for the old, deep, blessed truths, which gave joy and peace years ago, and are as necessary and lovely as ever. At the same time, the Bible is always fresh. It never grows insipid and tame. One always sees things in it which never appeared before. In this it resembles Nature, the sky, the sea, the landscape. All that God makes is so fresh, so wonderful, so new and young. To the end of life, you will always be bringing out of this Divine store-house the old and the new.

But as we enter this new track of time, let it be as new creatures in Christ Jesus, with new resolves, new hopes, new consecration. "If any man be in Christ, he is a new creature, old things have passed away, and behold all things are become new." And surely we must allow the new love which comes into young hearts to express itself in its own way. The new wine must be put into the new wine-skins, that it may ferment within them, and fashion them after its own will. It is as absurd to put the enthusiasm of the young generation which is devoting itself to Christ into the rigorous forms of former years as it would be to put new wine into an old dry bottleskin. Each heart will discover its own way of glorifying Christ. Mary will not give her 300 pence to the poor, but will break the alabaster box over the person of the Lord. I suppose the Christian Endeavour Society is the new bottle-skin for the fermenting earnestness of young hearts in the twentieth century. Let us thank God that it is so, and that there is no need for it to be spilled.

But let no one be surprised if those who have tasted of the old wine be not greatly enamoured of the new. "No," says the old disciple, "I don't care for these new-fangled ways; I need have a dictionary always at hand to interpret these letters; they used not to do things like this when I was young; I have no patience with young men and women talking so much in public." He is saying in effect, "The old is better." Well, let it be so. Perhaps he is right. Old experience is ripe and strong and stimulating. But then the new will be old some day, and the ferment will have died away. Then a new vintage of love, ripened by the sunshine of Divine love, will call for some fresh bottle-skin, and Christian Endeavour will have waxed old. But not yet, not yet, not as long as I live, I hope. F. B. M.

C.E. NOTES.

At the Pennsylvanian Christian Endeavour Convention special evangelistic services were held. During the two Convention days eighty meetings were held, thirty in factories, twenty-six in public institutions, ten in the open-air, and fourteen in car sheds, police and fire stations. It is estimated that 2,500 Endeavourers took part in the work, that nearly 20,000 people heard the Gospel, and about 250 persons expressed the desire to enter the Christian life.

* * *

Thrilling reports have come from the various meetings. One man followed some Endeavourers some distance to ask for an interest in their prayers. In some factories the people were in tears. A mill-owner was so impressed with the value of such meetings that he requested that services be conducted regularly in his establishment, promising to give his employés an additional fifteen minutes at noon that all might have opportunity to attend.

* * *

When a company reached a machine shop for a second day's meeting they were welcomed by several workmen carrying a banner with the C.E. monogram and the word, "Welcome." Some of the men told them that many of their fellow-workmen were deeply moved by the meeting of the previous day, and were at the point of deciding for Christ, and during the meeting two of the men made impassioned appeals to their companions. So these Endeavourers tried to do the Master's work.

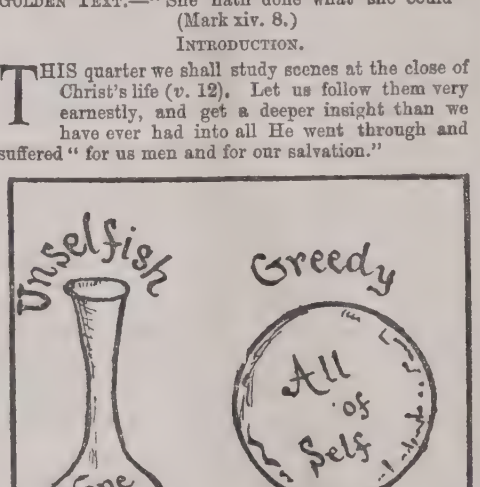
International S.S. Lesson.

January 6, 1901.

Jesus Anointed at Bethany (Matt. xxvi. 6-16).
Golden Text.—"She hath done what she could" (Mark xiv. 8.)

INTRODUCTION.

THIS quarter we shall study scenes at the close of Christ's life (v. 12). Let us follow them very earnestly, and get a deeper insight than we have ever had into all He went through and suffered "for us men and for our salvation."



Key to Blackboard Plan.—The narrow necked vase given by the woman is a silent witness of her unselfishness; there was "none of self," but "all for Christ." One of the thirty pieces of silver taken by Judas tells an opposite story, a story of greed and "all of self."

1. The Woman.

The woman was evidently Mary, sister of Lazarus. See John xii. 1-3. We know they lived at the small town of Bethany (6). They were some of Christ's faithful friends, and had evidently been asked to the house of Simon to meet Jesus. (7) Anointing was a usual custom in the east, and Mary wanted to do her very best for her Lord and Master, so she bought a most costly vase containing a sweet liquid perfume, and most likely had given all she possessed to purchase it. It was true, real, genuine love that prompted the gift. (7) "Very precious," (9) "might have been sold for much;" (John xii. 3) "very costly," all these expressions show us that it was valuable, and Mary was not a rich woman, therefore it meant self-denial on her part to have bought it. But what cared she? Jesus was worthy of all her love and of the very best token she could bring to show that love. Have we this spirit? this love? this devotion? (v. 7) "poured it," (Mark xiv. 3) "brake the box," that is, broke the narrow slender neck of the vase or the seal that kept it closed; it contained 1lb weight (John xii. 3) and the value would be about £10 English money. (v. 10) Jesus calls it "a good work," and He knew that Mary understood the far deeper meaning (12), see Luke x. 42.

2. Judas.

We turn with sorrow to the other figure, and mark how exactly opposite is his character to that of Mary. The woman "gave." Judas said, "give me" (15). He was all for self, none for Christ, he was full of greed, he was a thief (John xii. 6), he was a traitor (John vi. 70-71), and at last we read "Satan entered into him" (John xiii. 27.)

What an example and a warning to us of going the downward path! how easy for Satan to enter such a heart! Let us take care that nothing comes before Christ in us, put Him first, always first, give Him of your best, for He is worthy.

3. What Jesus Said.

Golden Text.—"She hath done what she could." (12) "For my burial." He saw that not many days on He would be betrayed by this very Judas, crucified, and buried, and He knew Mary could also look forward, and that she entered into the future more than many of those who stood around. (13) "She shall never be forgotten for this deed of love," and she never was, for you and I read about her to-day. Let us follow her example, too.

4. To Which Class Do You Belong?

To Judas, living for self, an easy prey to the enemy of our souls? Or to Mary, forgetful of self, full of love to her Saviour, giving her all and her best to Him?

FOR CHRIST'S SAKE.

NOT only have grown-up converts to Christianity in heathen lands to bear much for the dear Christ's sake, but girls and boys are called to suffer persecution also.

When the young accept Jesus Christ it often happens that in time of trial they show a courage that puts older native Christians to shame. Christ becomes so real to boys and girls who love Him that they can endure anything for his sake.

Sometimes heathen parents treat their children with the greatest cruelty when it is know that they have given their hearts to Jesus. It seems so unnatural for parents almost to hate their own offspring. For it does, in some cases, amount to hatred.

I thought you would like to hear how a Malagasy girl witnessed for Christ whose father treated her with the greatest severity. His ill-behaviour arose mainly because she refused to take part in a heathen festival. How could she do anything else but refuse when she came to see that Jesus was the only Saviour, and that worship should be paid to Him alone?

Rasoamiarana became a pupil in the Vatomandry School. After a little while some of the young people gave themselves to Jesus Christ and formed a "Christian Band." Their purpose was to oppose the wicked ways of the place, and to strive to lead good and pure lives themselves.

When the parents of Rasoamiarana heard that she had signed the pledge, and declined to drink any more rum, and would take no part in certain evil customs, they beat her savagely. Food was refused her; she was made to starve. Taunts were levelled at her, on the ground that if she did not want the rum, of course she must be ill, and

DID NOT WANT RICE EITHER.

Things came to a climax one day, when there was to be a heathen festival of the sacrifice of an ox to the spirit supposed to dwell in a sacred tree near the village. This offering is always made before rice-planting. The spirit of the tree is asked to bless the seed. Now Rasoamiarana had a remarkably sweet voice, and she had always been the leader of the singing on these occasions. She made up her mind, since she knew Jesus, not to sing again.

When the procession to the tree was formed she managed to escape notice. After all had started she crept back to the house, fell upon her knees, and prayed for help in the trial that she knew would come.

She was soon missed. Her father's angry voice was heard inquiring after her. She was dragged off to the jeering crowd waiting for her to sing. With heavy blows from a large stick, her father tried to force her to take her part as before. Neither blows nor abuse prevailed. She could not join in the heathen worship, as she was a follower of Christ.

She was then stripped of dress and lamba and driven into the forest and told that she might go and starve. For several days and nights she remained there, living upon roots and wild fruits. Hunger made her desperate, so she stole back to the village.

In time her parents relented a little. But she was so constant in her loyalty to Jesus that their anger soon broke out again. They drove her into the forest once more, and vowed never to let her enter their house again,

UNLESS SHE GAVE UP CHRISTIANITY.

She was a thin, frightened-looking girl when the missionary found her and took her to his own home.

I am sure you will be glad to know that she continued faithful to the Lord. A year or two afterwards, a young man belonging to her tribe went to Antananarivo to seek an educated Christian girl to be his wife and helper as a native teacher. He chose Rasoamiarana. When they were married they started at once to walk to their new home, about 150 miles from the capital.

She proved the truth of the divine words, "When my father and mother forsake me, then the Lord will take me up."

Best of all, God used both Rasoamiarana and her husband in teaching other members of their tribe the good tidings of great joy which are for all people through the advent of Jesus Christ.

Will it not strengthen our faith when we have to endure hardness as good soldiers of Jesus Christ, to remember how this Malagasy girl witnessed for Jesus in her days of persecution? J. W.

Famine in Shan-si.

Mr. F. C. H. Dreyer, of the China Inland Mission, has written an important letter, from which we give the following extracts:—

IT appears that the cup of sorrow of the Church in Shan-si is to be filled to overflowing. To the horrors of the Government and Boxer persecutions are now added the horrors of famine. The autumn crop in 1899 was in many districts a complete failure, and, owing to the continuance of the drought, the spring crop of the present year could be but partially sown. All hoped against hope that rain would fall in time to enable the sowing of the autumn crop; but this failed in most districts, and in consequence a famine now prevails throughout a large section of the province.

As early as May and June the distress was acute. The prices of all varieties of grain had risen to thrice their normal value, and were still continuing to rise. Pitiable appeals for help were made to us. We repeatedly heard of deaths from starvation, and it was painfully evident to all that each succeeding week would but deepen the distress and enlarge the circle of those affected. The various guilds supported the officials in exhausting the long list of devices for securing rain suggested by the various forms of divination and by the "three religions." The people were of anxiety and suspense. This fact has been undervalued in considering the Boxer outrages in Shan-si.

The missionaries, whose interests and sympathies lie in the temporal as well as in the spiritual well-being of those among whom they live and labour, assured that a famine was imminent, resolved to do all they could to help the people, especially the Christians, in their distress. Early in June it was felt that the time had come to acquaint the world with the seriousness of the situation, so a statement was drawn up by Mr. Duncan Kay, of K'üh-u. As far as is known, this statement was signed by all but one of the missionaries of South Shan-si. Dr. W. Millar Wilson undertook to secure the signatures of the missionaries at Tai-yuen-fu, and then forward it to the coast, but needless to say, it never got farther than Tai-yuen.

The area is very great, for we learn that in many parts of Chih-li, Shan-tung, Northern Honan, and Shensi, as well as in Shan-si, the continued drought has caused great distress. A careful estimate was made at the time, and it was found that at least £10,000 would be required to keep the Christians of this district and their immediate families alive until the wheat harvest could be reaped next spring, supposing, of course, that rain came in time. If that were to fail, as it appears to have done, the needs would defy computation. It is sadly touching that Dr. Millar Wilson, on the eve of his departure, gave 500 taels as his first contribution towards a relief fund, promising additional help as the needs increased.

Friends desiring to help, may send to our care, or to the China Inland Mission, Newington Green, London, N.

Romanism in America.

MISS M. T. ELDER, niece of Archbishop Elder, of Cincinnati, who created such a sensation a few years ago by her declaration in a paper read at a public gathering, that the Roman Church had lost "20,000,000 souls" in that country during the present century, has again stirred up wrath among the American subjects of the Pope. This time she has been reproaching her Church because Protestants have so much more extensively and successfully employed lay activity in religious and philanthropic enterprises. She makes special reference to the Y.M.C.A., the King's Daughters, the Summer Schools, Social Settlements, and similar organizations, holding them up for the emulation of her co-religionists. The Catholic Mirror, of Baltimore, which is generally regarded as the organ of Cardinal Gibbons, says that the scheme outlined by Bishop Messner, of Green Bay, Wisconsin, is a vindication of Miss Elder's contention, and maintains that she has in no wise attacked either the Church or the priesthood.

Haiti—West Indies.

STRENUOUS efforts have for some time been made by Pastor L. Ton Evans, of Barry, South Wales, and others, to arouse a deeper concern in missionary circles for the neglected negroes of Haïti, who are almost entirely given to Vaudoo worship, with its revolting practices. The following stirring particulars from a native pastor and missionary at Jacmel—Nosirel L'herrison, an ex-Romanist—explain the present position of Gospel work in the island, and show the urgency of the needs of these dark and misguided people.

"On Sunday we had in the afternoon a sort of missionary meeting. We had arranged it in order to give the Jacmel people an idea of the work in the country. We had to burn publicly all the spoils of a 'houndfort,' a place of worship belonging to the Vaudoo, and where the papalois (obeaman) presides at the service.

"There were drums, images, crucifixes, and many other things there which I cannot find English names for. Before we set fire to them, I spoke of Romanism, the so-called island religion, and showed the moral darkness in which it keeps the people and the enlightening and elevating influence of the Gospel of Christ. The people present were much struck with what they heard and saw. "The poor ex-papalois at whose desire the destruction was made, was in the centre with his wife. At the close of the meeting I called upon him to make of his faith in Christ. He spoke before all present, including his own sons, in a very touching way, and appeared to be much affected, saying that though he knew he would be persecuted by them, he did not care, and that he was now most anxious that he should prove faithful and true to his only Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. At the close of this confession, which was solemnly listened to, I presented him with a French Bible."

Prayer is asked that this and other converts in the Haïtian bush may be strengthened in their faith, and become a blessing to the inhabitants of the island. Rev. L. Ton Evans, Harreggy, Barry, South Wales, will be glad to furnish information.

Lebanon Hospital for the Insane.

SINCE the last report of this institution at Asfuriyeth (near Beyrout) appeared two years ago, progress has been made in many directions. The completion of the Hospital has afforded much satisfaction to those who have rendered this possible by their sympathy with the deplorable condition of the mentally afflicted poor in Bible Lands. On a formal declaration that the Hospital was open to receive patients being made, known relatives of sufferers flocked round in order to obtain admission for their friends. The Executive Committee in Beyrout proceeded with careful discretion, and only the most pressing cases have been admitted. The inmates now include Jews, Mohammedans, Druses, Greeks, Maronites, and Protestants.

The buildings of the institution comprise one central administration block, containing business, superintendent's and doctor's residences, offices, stores, and committee room. This block with the land is regarded as the GIFT OF BRITISH SUBSCRIBERS.

A large pavilion, erected for male patients, has been paid for by American friends; and a similar cottage for female patients, partly provided by Swiss subscribers. A small nurses' home has been adapted from a building which was on the estate when purchased. All these are comfortably furnished, consistent with strict economy.

Accommodation is thus provided for forty patients, which, however, is a small number compared with the vast multitude of mentally diseased in the country. The estimated total annual cost for the maintenance of the hospital is £1,500. Papers referring to the institution may be had of the secretary, Mr. Francis C. Brading, 35, Queen Victoria Street, London, E.C.

Religious Life in Canada.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

SINCE the visit of Revs. G. H. C. Macgregor, C. Inwood, and H. Brooke, to Canada some years ago, for the purpose of holding meetings for the deepening of spiritual life, similar gatherings have been held each succeeding year with more or less gratifying results. This year several conventions have been held, and others are in progress. The first took place in Montreal, and was followed by a more general one in Ottawa; while at present a two-weeks' series of meetings is being conducted at Cobourg. In these conventions the different denominations are represented, and a very noticeable and gratifying result is the growing unity and goodwill among the churches.

The annual Christian Endeavour Convention at Guelph this season was of more than usual interest, by reason of the presence of Rev. C. M. Sheldon, the well-known author of "In His Steps." Two of the largest buildings in the city were secured, and yet the accommodation was far from sufficient. Mr. Sheldon is a man with a message, and most attentively did the great audiences listen to his stirring words.

And now, as the century is nearing a close, there is apparent everywhere a desire for a revival of religion to signalize this epoch of time. Special services are in progress in many churches, and will be inaugurated in others. The regular preaching is more evangelistic in tone, and is aiming more earnestly at definite decision for God and his service. At the fortnightly meeting of the Toronto Ministerial Association, composed of ministers of all Evangelical denominations, on November 26, a paper was read on "Revivals," the outcome of which was a resolution agreeing to hold a meeting to prepare for an awakening. The earnestness manifested gave some ground for the remark of a prominent member, that the meeting was the beginning of a great revival.

Schwifat Mission Schools.

FROM time to time happy examples are brought to light of the spiritual good resulting from the work carried on at Miss Procter's Mission and Schools, Schwifat, Mount Lebanon. Many will recall the visit to England last year of Miss Procter, with the object of raising funds to complete the boys' school. This has been opened free from debt. The building will accommodate comfortably fifty boys and three masters, as well as an English gentleman to superintend the work.

"We are praying," writes Miss Procter, "that God will raise up a true Christian scholar to fill the post, one who will seek above all to win these young folks for Christ. One of the things that cheer me in my work is that the girls trained here have generally become earnest Christians, and are giving satisfaction to those who employ them. There are now thirty-five teaching in different parts of the country." Mr. T. J. Knight, Bush Hill, Winchmore Hill, London, N., will furnish information to friends interested in the work.

Indian Students.

IN the course of a communication asking prayer for work among Indian students, Mr. R. P. Wilder writes:—"There are 115 arts and forty professional colleges, containing 19,000 students. If we include the training schools for masters, industrial schools, schools of art, law, medicine, engineering, and surveying, we find in this empire 412 higher institutions of learning, with 31,884 students. There are in addition 840 high schools for boys with 183,993 pupils and 1,922 middle English schools, with 155,841 pupils. The intercollegiate Y.M.C.A. has thirty-two branches, with a membership of over 1,400. There are in addition, in twenty-two city associations, 816 past and present students. So the full number of students in connection with the Y.M.C.A.'s of India is over 2,200. We are grateful for this, but it is only a beginning. We long for a deeper awakening."

The late Principal Cave, D.D.

AFTER struggling for some months against a complication of diseases, Rev. Dr. Cave, the esteemed Principal of Hackney College, scholar, theologian, and author, passed away on Wednesday, December 19.

Dr. Cave was born in London in 1847, and was at an early age a member of Craven Chapel, Regent Street, W. He was originally intended for the medical profession, but in 1866 entered New College (then under the late Dr. Newth), where he remained for six years. Mr. Cave, as he then was, undertook at Berkhamstead, Herts. Not many years elapsed, however, before he was compelled to resign his charge owing to ill-health, which then took the form of heart disease, the remains of an earlier attack of rheumatic fever. Bravely fighting against these troubles, Mr. Cave devoted himself to literary work, the result of which was seen in his first volume, "The Scriptural Doctrine of Sacrifice." With a certain improvement in health, he undertook to return to pastoral work, and founded a new Congregational Church at Watford, the denomination being at that time unrepresented there. In 1880 Mr. Cave was invited to occupy the post of professor and resident-tutor at Hackney College, Wells Street, Hackney. Two years later he became Principal, on the retirement of the late Dr. Samuel McCall. Not long after his appointment, he commenced to work for the removal of the Institution from the insalubrious neighbourhood and limited accommodation of Well Street, to a district and a building more in harmony with the dignity of a College for the training of candidates for the ministry. The present in Finchley Road is largely due to the initiative and energy of Dr. Cave.

HIS FIRST PASTORATE

IMPOSING PILE OF BUILDINGS

Notwithstanding the exacting nature of his duties as head of the College, and his large output of literary work, Dr. Cave found time during recent years to lend very valuable aid to the movement in favour of a new teaching university for London, which has now successfully culminated in the adoption of the scheme, including the creation of a Faculty of Theology, a cause for which Dr. Cave fought with untiring energy. He was deeply interested, too, in the formation of the West Hampstead Congregational Church, which met at first in the College Library. He took a very active part in securing the erection of the edifice in which the church is now housed.

Among theological works from Dr. Cave's pen are his first volume, "The Scriptural Doctrine of Sacrifice," and among later works, "The Inspiration of the Old Testament," "An Introduction to Theology," and "The Spiritual World."

Dr. Cave has filled the chair of the London Congregational Board, and was for two years a "Merchant's Lecturer." Last year he crossed the Atlantic and read a striking paper on at the International Council, which aroused wide-spread attention. He was the guest of Rev. Dr. Lorimer, whose pulpit he occupied at the Tremont Temple.

"THE LIVING CHRIST"

In 1872, Dr. Cave married Sarah, the widow of the late William Hallifax, of Berkhamstead, who survives him, and whose devotion and practical sympathy had done so much to help her husband in accomplishing such useful work, despite severe drawbacks in the matter of health.

As a religious teacher and organizer, and a convincing preacher, characterized by deep evangelical convictions, Dr. Cave will be greatly missed.

Appeal for Books.—Mrs. Janie King, who is labouring in the West Indies, is desirous of opening an evening and Sabbath school at St. Vincent, for the hundreds of poor white people, many of whom are uneducated. Mrs. Lizzy Morris, Edgar Lodge, 120, Brixton Hill, S.W., will be grateful for books to forward for this purpose.

Scottish Notes.

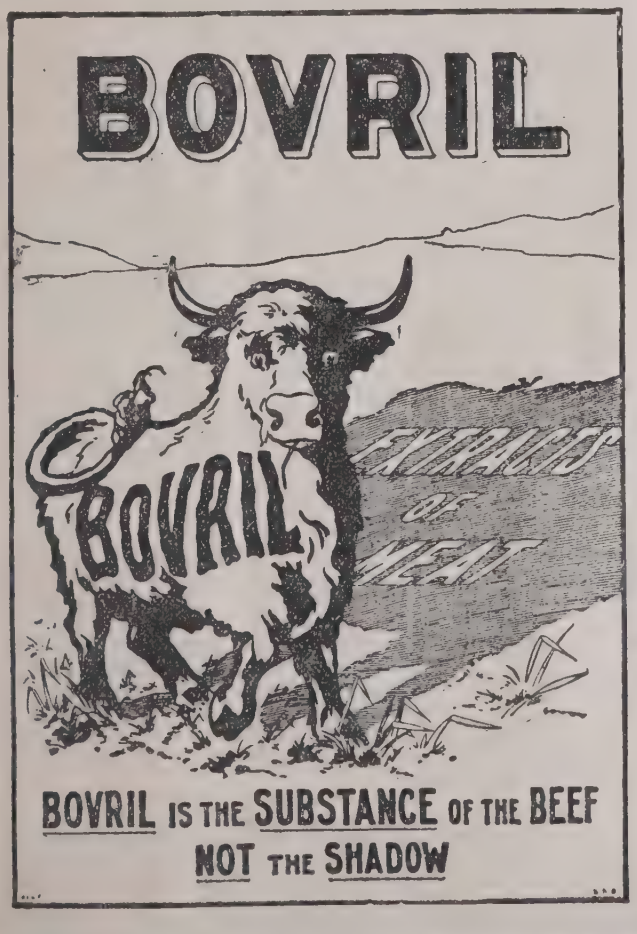
AT the annual meeting last week of the Scottish Sabbath Protection Association, it was agreed to hold special services calling attention to the Lord's Day, in connection with the Glasgow International Exhibition of 1901.

The Scottish Coast Mission has now twelve workers at different points between Arbroath and Berwick-on-Tweed, covering in all thirty-two stations. There had been 1,134 meetings held on shore, in addition to 312 in the open air, 563 for children, and 265 on shipboard. The missionaries had made 9,383 visits to ships, and 22,437 on shore, and a large circulation of Christian literature had been accomplished.

The annual gathering of the Ayrshire Christian Union was held on Saturday, December 8, at Ayr, Mr. John Galloway (of Ardrossan, president of the Union) presiding. Lord Provost Chisholm (Glasgow) gave an address on "Christian Service," in which he gave hearty expression to his satisfaction and joy at the union of churches recently accomplished. Mr. John Colville, M.P., was also among the speakers.

A conference was held last week under the auspices of the National Sabbath School Union, to consider how services for children might be made more attractive. Mr. T. Stark Brown quoted figures to show that the schools in connection with the Established and United Free Churches have decreased during the past year by sixty, teachers by 837, and the average attendance of scholars by 8,394. Among other suggestions brought forward were giving greater attention to the provision of suitable premises, the appointment of trained teachers, and a closer union between school and congregation.

Investigations made in Dundee on a recent Sabbath revealed the fact that in 567 establishments trading was being carried on. Of these, 35 were the premises of chemists, 268 confectioners, 67 dairies, 38 eating-houses, 23 fruiterers, 69 grocers, 4 newsagents, 2 tea-rooms, 36 temperance bars, and 25 tobacconists. Even at this late season of the year ice-cream was on sale at 72 establishments, while to entice the appetites of the young it was trundled through the streets of the city in 19 wheelbarrows. Of the proprietors of the 72 shops who had ice-cream on sale, 47 were Italians.



Over Five

and kindred public institutions, including all the most important in the United Kingdom, are regular users of Bovril. Such a practical public endorsement is conclusive evidence of the absolute purity of Bovril, and of its great value as a nourishing stimulant in convalescence.

So unanimous a verdict, and so great a testimonial, has never before been given to any similar preparation.

Evangelistic.

Mr. Leonard Weaver at Birmingham.

MR. LEONARD WEAVER has paid another visit to Birmingham. On Sunday, December 23, speaking to a large gathering of young people in John Street Hall, in the afternoon, he gave an impressive address, with many touching illustrations of wasted lives.

There was a remarkable scene at the close, many seeking the Lord. The superintendent and teachers rejoiced in seeing answers to prayer. In the evening, Mr. Weaver spoke to a crowded audience in Trinity Hall. God used his servant to the conviction of many, and at the close a large number of persons, old and young, were crying, "What must I do to be saved?" The local friends praise God for these times of revival blessing; they have been greatly cheered and refreshed.

Mr. Henry Thorne at Herne Bay.

Mr. Henry Thorne has held a mission from December 8-17, in the Baptist Chapel, Herne Bay. Many profess to have trusted Christ as their Saviour, and a great deepening of spiritual life has been experienced by many believers.

Night after night Mr. Thorne placed the glorious truths of the Gospel before his hearers. The careless and hitherto indifferent were melted to tears as with earnest pleading men were entreated to seek the Lord. The power of the Spirit was ever present, and the church at Herne Bay gives thanks to God that, through his servant, out of what seemed barren soil, such fruitful harvest should appear. Praise be to the name of Jesus, "the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever." J.S.G.

Gipsy Smith at Luton.

The mission conducted by Gipsy Smith at Luton, in connection with the Local Free Church Council, concluded on December 17. It has been one of the most remarkable movements in the religious history of the town. A chapel seating 2,000 has been crowded each night before the time, and overflow meetings have had to be held. In the ten days over 1,000 persons passed through the enquiry rooms. Some idea of the enthusiasm may be gathered from the practical fact that a sum of over £200 was received in the week; £100 of that amount in freewill offerings. Gipsy Smith considers it to be the most fruitful ten days' mission he has conducted. The ministers and church members are one in a feeling of profound thanksgiving.

A nine days' mission has been concluded at Coverdale Chapel, Limehouse, by Mr. Misa Bhai. The church has been greatly blessed, many of its young people, with a number of adults, have decided for Christ. R. D. Thomas, Pastor.

A fifteen days' mission has been concluded at the Drill Hall, St. Albans, by Mr. George Hunter, of Aberdeen. There were some striking instances of blessing. At the concluding mission there was an audience of about 2,000. A most pleasing feature of the mission was the great interest manifested by the local ministers of all evangelical denominations.

On Sunday, December 16, Mr. Stafford Smith, of the Evangelization Society, completed a fifteen days' mission at London Street Congregational Church, Newport, Mon. On the last day of the mission some forty persons professed conversion. There are no doubtful methods used by Mr. Smith, and seekers came voluntarily as a result of his faithful preaching. An attractive feature was the beautiful singing of the missioner. His visit will be long remembered with joy and gratitude. Good work was done among the children at the services for the young.

D. Hymel Wigley, Pastor.

Request for Prayer.

That at the Mission Hall to be opened on January 6 at Claremont Road, Cricklewood, many may be brought to the Lord.

Mr. John Denning's Work.—The annual report of the work at Southsea, Portsmouth, and district, carried on by Mr. John Denning, has been issued, and from it we find that, in the Gospel tent on Southsea Common, as well as in Gospel preaching in various parts of the Western counties, evangelistic work has been carried on with much good effect. The missions conducted by Mr. Denning have been helped by the exhibition of a large picture illustrative of "The Two Ways." Copies of the report may be obtained from Mr. Denning, Shirley Lodge, St. Ursula Grove, Southsea.

About Books.

A FRAGRANT LIFE.

IT is a long time since we read a book of such varied interest as the memoir of her missionary sister, which has been given us by Mrs. Ashley Carus Wilson, B.A., the well-known author of "Clews to Holy Writ"—Irene Petrie; Missionary to Kashmir. (6s. Hodder & Stoughton.) The subject was beautiful in youth, and greatly beloved in maturer years. Fine portraits and other illustrations embellish the volume, which should be read by all friends of mission work abroad, and well deserves the attention of young ladies who would know how one whose personal charms were widely recognised filled her life with goodness, and was rich in the service of others.

We have here the story of a lady of culture, who left a happy home to place her talents on the altar of Christian labour, and spread brightness in surroundings of ignorance and gloom. Miss Petrie had been presented at Court, and attended Keswick Convention. She was "herself" on both occasions. The going forth as a missionary—an honorary worker in association with the C.M.S.—was, we are told, the full application of the principle on which she had always tried to act—of giving not merely her substance but herself to others in every possible way, and wherever the need was greatest.

Of the forty-five months which elapsed between her departure from England in October, 1893, and her death, thirty-four were months of incessant labour, of which four and a half were spent at St. Hilda's, Lahore; four on the Jhelum and at Gulmarg, Kashmir; and twenty-five and a half in Srinagar.

In this period of less than three years she mastered Urdu and Kashmiri, and made some progress in Hindi; and she diligently instructed in the faith of the Gospel five different classes of people: children of Europeans, through Sunday schools; Eurasians, especially women and children; her own servants, mostly Mohammedans; Kashmiri schoolboys, mostly Hindus; and zenana women, Hindu and Mohammedan, of many different degrees socially and intellectually. Her musical and artistic powers were turned to account to secure friends and funds for the work in a variety of ways; her pen spoke of it to many at home, both in magazine articles and in private letters.

All too soon, as we reckon, was the precious life taken, and the devoted servant of Christ withdrawn from the field. The esteem in which she was held may be judged from the fact that the historian of the Church Missionary Society wrote: "In her India lost a woman missionary probably the most brilliant and cultured of all the ladies on the C.M.S. roll." Miss Petrie will not soon be forgotten. This book will delight those who knew her, and make others regret that they had not the same pleasure. It is gratifying to note that an Irene Petrie Memorial Fund is being raised, with the object of maintaining one more missionary in Kashmir in connection with the work of the C.M.S. We heartily commend this volume to our readers. It should be placed in the way of young ladies who have not yet learned the secret of making the most of life.

Harry among the Gipsies (1s. J. & P. Parlane, Paisley) is an interesting story by Ewen Romilly. The steps are traced by which a wilful, wayward boy was brought to the truth.

The Home Messenger is an attractive monthly; its annual volume is a budget of good reading, amply illustrated. There are interesting series of articles on Home Life, the Duties of Church Members, and sketches of distinguished Free Churchmen. (Horace Marshall & Son.)

The Record of Christian Work represents the operations of Mr. Moody's institutions at Chicago, Northfield, and elsewhere; it is also a monthly review of religious thought and activity. It contains suggestive articles on Bible study, devotional reading, and methods of Christian work. (6s. per annum, post free, Morgan & Scott.)

The contents of the annual volume of The Young Man are characterized by the usual variety of topic. Sketches of notabilities, with portraits, abound, and there are symposiums on subjects of interest. A specially thoughtful series of articles is "The Old Chivalry and the New," by Rev. E. Griffith-Jones (Horace Marshall & Son.)

A convenient little book of reference is the Baptist Almanack for 1901. There is a portrait and sketch of Rev. John Robertson (2d. Banks & Son.

Mr. Silas Henn's booklet, The Tobacco Curse, noticed in our last issue, may be had from him at 4, Himley Road, Dudley, Worces., post free for six penny stamps.

Mr. R. Brimelow, 1, Cambridge Arcade, Southport, publishes choice illuminated booklets and cards. Among the latter are some that will find ready welcome for enclosing in letters, several of them embossed and folded, with poems by Winifred A. Iverson.

Irish Notes.

REV. WILLIAM HEWITT is going out from Derry under the auspices of the Church Missionary Society to India, and Rev. Walter Chadwick, son of the Bishop of Derry, is about to go as missionary to Uganda, where his sister, Miss Chadwick, has been working for some years. Mrs. Potter, of Derry, is also going to Uganda. Thus Derry will soon be well represented in the mission field.

Rev. F. W. Ainley, who took an active part in holding open-air services in Cork, where he had been most active and zealous for the past seventeen years, has got an incumbency at North Islington, and is therefore removing to London in a few weeks. As an earnest Christian worker, Mr. Ainley will be much missed in Cork.

Mr. William Lumley, of Tullamore, one of the most prominent and best-known Methodists in Ireland, has just died in his eighty-second year. Deceased was the father of Rev. W. B. Lumley, of the Dublin Central Mission, and one of his daughters is wife to Rev. Charles Inwood. He took an intelligent interest in all religious questions, and was a generous supporter of every good cause.

A successful Temperance Conference has been held in Londonderry under the presidency of the Bishop of Derry. Rev. Mr. Wynne, of Dublin, attended as a deputation, and several persons took part in the proceedings. It was also resolved to appoint an inspector for the purpose of seeing that the licensing laws are properly enforced, and to employ a solicitor to oppose the granting of new licences.

Church Notes.

The Dean of Peterborough is lying seriously ill at his residence at Peterborough. Dr. Ingram, it is reported, has had a slight stroke.

Rev. A. A. Boddy, Vicar of All Saints', Monkwearmouth, intends to abandon the Eastward Position. He does this, he says, "to emphasize his adhesion to the Reformed Church, and thereby take a stand with his Evangelical brethren.

It has been decided that when Rev. J. G. Greenhough, who succeeds in March Rev. Charles H. Kelly as President of the National Council of Evangelical Free Churches, retires from the office, he shall be followed in 1902 by a member of one of the younger Methodist Churches.

A number of "Century Conventions" have just been held in various parts of the kingdom in connection with the United Methodist Free Churches, and on every hand testimony is borne that they have become starting-points for that aggressive work which is so much needed throughout the land.

About two years ago a section of the Abingdon Street Baptist Church, Blackpool, withdrew and commenced to hold Sunday services at the Opera House. The differences which caused the separation have now been settled, and in the course of a week the two congregations will join and worship together.

The late Rev. Roberts Lang, of Dundee, left all his money to the London Missionary Society. The society will benefit immediately to the extent of £13,000, and has a reversion of a further £10,000. Mr. Lang, who was a Congregational minister in Dundee, was a liberal supporter of the society, and last year subscribed £700.

The venerable Dr. John G. Paton recently addressed a crowded audience in the Victoria Rooms, Bristol, in aid of the New Hebrides Mission. Mr. L. P. Nott, who presided, said they were met for a threefold object—to do honour to one of the missionary heroes of the nineteenth century, to hear of his work, and to render substantial aid to it.

Kingsgate Street Baptist Church, Holborn, London, has been used for public worship for the last time. The building, which has stood for seventy years, occupies a site which must be cleared in connection with the Strand Improvement Scheme. As is well known, a site for the proposed Baptist Church House has been allotted to the Baptist Union by the County Council in exchange for the land on which Kingsgate Chapel has stood.

The arrangements for the Presbyterian Conference to be held at Regent Square Church, London, on January 3, include a communion service to be presided over by Principal Dykes, D.D., of Cambridge, the address being given by Rev. Robert Taylor. This is to be followed by a Conference on "Personal Religion," the openers of the Conference being Dr. Dykes and Dr. Monro Gibson. The afternoon session is to be occupied by a discussion of "Evangelistic Methods," the subject being introduced by Rev. F. S. Webster, M.A., of All Souls', Langham Place, and Mr. Frank T. Bullen.

The President of the Wesleyan Conference, in a Pastoral message, says that the passing of the century is an event which cannot fail to excite deep feelings. Methodists have reached a critical stage in their denominational history. They must advance or they will decline. A Church in a growing nation cannot be extended and built up without great sacrifice. The greatest opportunity of their history is at hand in the present time. By material resources they will prepare the way for spiritual enterprise. The determination to complete the Million Fund is firm. The President reminds Methodists that much will depend upon the religious services which mark the close of the old and the opening of the New Year. Let them begin the new century in the spirit of lofty devotion. The Pastoral also refers to the Free Churches' "Million Pledges" crusade, also to the Simultaneous Mission, and invites zealous co-operation in both these movements.

Fallen Asleep.

Rev. T. G. Horton, father of Dr. R. F. Horton, of Hampstead, aged seventy-three. He lately retired from the pastorate of Portishead Congregational Church. Educated at Edinburgh, he entered the Congregational ministry in 1853, and was pastor of Tonbridge Chapel, Euston-road, also of churches at Bradford and Portishead.—Rev. Joseph Hodgson, pastor of the Anstey Congregational Church. Mr. Hodgson had been in delicate health for many months, and died while visiting his native place, Cotherstone, Yorkshire.—Mrs. Guest, widow of the late Rev. William Guest, a Congregational minister for many years.
